And the Miramax money train which "English Patient" rode all the way to glory didn't stop at the end of post-production. Sensing after the early reviews that "Patient" had a chance to grab a Best Picture Academy Award, Miramax spent a reported $20 to $30 million in additional funds to bring the film to mainstream audiences, a strategy that paid off handsomely, with "Patient" grossing over $60 million in the U.S. alone as of Oscar night.

Like many of the decisions made by Miramax toppers Bob and Harvey Weinstein during their amazing recent careers, betting the farm on "The English Patient" proved both a gutsy move and a wise one. If the backstage reaction to "Patient's" nine Oscar wins from members of the international press was any indication, it's likely the film will be an even bigger hit abroad than it is in the U.S. But it does nothing to diminish Miramax's smarts or its achievement to point out that it's doubtful Miramax could have lavished such financial largesse on a single project if it weren't for the fact that Miramax is a wholly-owned subsidiary of the Walt Disney Co., whose pockets are as deep as it gets.

As the Weinsteins themselves have pointed out in recent interviews, Miramax isn't the only "indie" film company with a great big corporate safety net spread out beneath its feet as it walks that precarious film-finance tightrope wire. Despite the fact that it is clearly a fully-articulated and characteristically quirky Coen Brothers project, "Fargo" was financed and marketed by Gramercy, which is a subsidiary of the enormous Dutch media conglomerate Polygram. "Shine" distributor Fine Line, meanwhile, was part of Ted Turner's media empire (subsequently absorbed by Time Warner) when it acquired "Shine," the film which netted previously unknown Australian actor Rush his Best Actor trophy. It should be pointed out, however, that as an acquisition title, "Shine" was produced outside the Fine Line/Turner corporate fold. "Sling Blade," the other newsmaking "indie" of Oscar '97, was likewise produced by a tiny, New York-based production house called The Shooting Gallery before Miramax acquired and then promoted the heck out of it.

ACTING UP: Best Actor Geoffrey Rush and Best Actress Frances McDormand. Their awards showed that the Academy was willing to reward risky or idiosyncratic performances. (AMPAS)

In fact, despite the "indies are in" and "Sundance West" comments that were written about Oscar '97 in virtually every major media outlet covering the world of film, "The English Patient" was in most ways a far more conservative choice than some of the studio titles (like "The Silence of the Lambs," "Unforgiven" or even "Forrest Gump") which have received the Best Picture nod in the past ten years. Very British, very novelistic, very lush and very long, "Patient" had the patina of quality and class to which Oscar has always aspired stamped large across its every frame. The only real surprise is that "Patient" wasn't a studio title, since it embodied more of Hollywood's traditional ideas about what constitutes filmic excellence than perhaps any other Oscar winner of the 1990s.

The truth about Oscar 1997 was that the studios were under-represented in both the nomination and awards process in great part because, when it comes to making movies that are even somewhat in the vein of "art for art's sake," they have largely left the field of battle. With the somewhat ironic exception of "The English Patient's" original home studio, 20th Century Fox (which was rightly peeved over the lack of Academy attention directed at its superb adaptation of Arthur Miller's "The Crucible"), it's hard to find so much as a handful of studio features made in 1996 that even aspired to the kind of thematic sophistication the Academy Awards are supposed to be all about. This is perhaps an inevitable outcome of the focusing of so much production capital on popcorn spectacles like the upcoming "Titanic" or "Mars Attacks!" In the very money driven environment of contemporary Hollywood, the successful blockbuster has replaced the Oscar as the ultimate status symbol.

If the 1996 production cycle was the "Cinderella" year for American mavericks, then the studios might do well to keep an eye on this year's Oscar clock. When midnight comes in the "Cinderella" myth, somebody is always reduced to rags. This year, anyone paying attention could have justifiably told the majors to ask not for whom the bell tolled. It tolled for them.

JUNE TRAILERS

No hilarity, just celerity: Summer's big titles mean big business, and fast

Even before cinema's giant summer season arrived, the pressure of too many huge titles and too few post-production days to hit one's release mark caused a casualty: Paramount moved "The Flood" from May 2 to fall or perhaps 1998. But that's not slowing down other potential blockbusters, which in June begin not only to arrive, but to arrive with speed, too.

Aptly, "Speed 2" (see photo) and "Con Air" lead off the month explosively on June 6, with not all the big bangs occurring onscreen; many are happening behind the scenes, with Fox and Buena Vista battling for screens and audiences. The scenario is made all the more contentious because both films share the action genre.

Compared to that fracas, the rest of June's slate looks downright gentlemanly in its composition—in the sense that the other majors have respectfully avoided Warner Bros.' "Batman & Robin" June 20 opening. Even on the following weekend, the two studio competitors (Buena Vista's "Hercules" and TriStar's "My Best Friend's Wedding") take only indirect aim at the Caped Crusader, going after the family and the date-night demos, respectively.

But, come July, it's a return to first-weekend contretemps, when "Men In Black" and "Titanic" launch 7/2. All in all, it's a season for setting the rudder amidships and sailing full speed ahead.

JUNE 6

Con Air

Oscar winner Nicolas Cage ("The Rock") stars in this Touchstone action/drama as Cameron Poe, a parolee heading home to his family. Hitching a ride on a flight carrying convicts to a maximum security facility, he becomes embroiled in a midair hijacking thanks to criminal mastermind Cyrus "The Virus" Grissom (John Malkovich). On the ground, U.S. Marshal Vince Larkin ("Grosse Point Blank's" John Cusack) teams with Poe to stop the savage killers before Larkin's superiors blow the aircraft and all its passengers from the sky. Music video director Simon West makes his feature debut; Scott Rosenberg ("Things to Do in Denver When You're Dead") scripts; Jerry Bruckheimer produces. See our Sneak Preview in this issue. (Buena Vista, 6/6)

Exploitips: Buena Vista didn't flinch when Fox moved "Speed 2" to "Con Air's" 6/6 date, perhaps in the belief it had the stronger hand. Indeed, the credits here are pure testosterone, perfect for selling an actioner, and the same weekend last year worked wonders for Cage/Bruckheimer's "The Rock." Still, while "Speed 2" is down Keanu Reeves, "Con Air" is down Sean Connery, diluting the strength of both entries. Exhibitors booking "Con Air" should emphasize the Cage/Bruckheimer (and date) heritage.

Speed 2: Cruise Control

Director/producer Jan De Bont returns for this "Speed" sequel, which trades in a runaway bus for an oceangoing vessel. The spunky Annie (Sandra Bullock, reprising her role) and her new boyfriend Alex ("Sleepers'" Jason Patric, taking over for Keanu Reeves) decide to take a leisurely cruise in the Caribbean. But all leisure evaporates when a criminal mastermind ("The English Patient's" Willem Dafoe) commandeers the ship and heads them full speed toward doom. Temeura Morrison ("Barb Wire"), Brian McCardie ("Rob Roy") and Glenn Plummer (who returns as record executive Maurice) co-star. Randall McCormick, Jeff Nathanson, Kevin Peterka and Greg Chabot script; Steve Perry also produces. (Fox, 6/6)

Exploitips: Fox bumped this title up from 7/2, when it would have faced Paramount's "Titanic" (which Fox Intl. wants to open big stateside, given that it controls foreign) and Columbia's "Men In Black." It's still a brave move, in that "Speed 2" now makes a direct demographic collision with Buena Vista's "Con Air," which though not a sequel has "Remember 'The Rock'" written all over it. Also, "Speed" was a Keanu Reeves vehicle; in his absence, "Speed 2" is a Bullock vehicle. Still, though male stars usually sell actioners, the Bullock name is the strongest element here; Fox (and exhibitors) need hope she will draw the distaff demo to plug any male-support leakage.

Buddy

Based on a true story, this comedy/drama tells the tale of an eccentric socialite, Gertrude Lintz ("Tin Cup's" Rene Russo), who nurses an infant gorilla to health and then raises the creature as her child. Robbie Coltrane and Irma P. Hall co-star. Caroline Thompson ("Black Beauty") directs and scripts; Steve Nicolaides and Fred Fuchs produce; among the executive producers of this first film from Jim Henson Pictures (a co-production with American Zoetrope) is Francis Coppola. (Columbia, 6/6)

Exploitips: ShoWest response to the "Buddy" clip at the Sony event was split; some thought it looked like cute family fare, while others were reminded of such monkey mistakes as "Dunston Checks In" and "Ed." In a savvy move, Sony saw an opening for young-demo fare in early June and moved "Buddy" from fall. The creative credits are all high-pro—just as they were with Thompson's "Black Beauty," a children's movie of adult despair that had little boxoffice kick. Given the older-leaning competition, and given its ape, "Buddy" must be sold to single-digit youngsters, so its key sell is the Henson imprimatur.

Mouth to Mouth

This Spanish-language screwball comedy follows the misadventures of Victor ("Jamon Jamon's" Javier Bardem), a struggling actor in Madrid who takes a temporary job at a phone sex service. He is quickly sidetracked by a sexy client, Amanda ("A Walk in the Clouds'" Aitana Sanchez-Gijon), involving him in a complex plot with Amanda's husband, also a client. Maria Barranco and Josep Maria Flotats co-star. Manuel Gomez Pereira directs, and he scripts with Joaquin Oristrell, Juan Luis Iborra and Naomi Wise; Benitez, Oristrell and Pereira produce. (Miramax, 6/6)

Exploitips: "Mouth to Mouth" was originally slated by Miramax for release on 6/21—in 1996. An early fall date was also scrubbed. Yet playing up the Bardem and Sanchez-Gijon credits should draw the experienced art-house crowd and perhaps some crossover mainstreamers in a light-on-specialized weekend.

The Pillow Book

Controversial filmmaker Peter Greenaway ("The Cook, the Thief, the Wife and Her Lover") brings his unique vision to another unique drama: A young Japanese woman, Nagiko Kiohara (Vivian Wu), has developed a penchant for writing on flesh because her loving father (Hideko Yoshido) used to write traditional birthday messages on her face as a girl. Nagiko exits her abusive arranged marriage to seek a man who will continue the birthday tradition. "Trainspotting's" Ewan McGregor co-stars. The film mixes Japanese, Mandarin, Cantonese and English languages. Greenaway directs and scripts; Kees Kasander produces. (CFP, 6/6)

Exploitips: Our Cannes reviewer (July '96 issue) gave "The Pillow Book" three stars, saying Greenaway was "as stunning and inscrutable as ever.... Each voluptuous, sometimes shocking image" seems self-contained, but that eventually leads to a feeling of "disjointedness." The Greenaway and McGregor names will draw art-house audiences, and so will emphasizing the film's sensual theme.

In and Out

In this comedy, "Fierce Creatures'" Kevin Kline stars as Howard Brackett, a popular high school English teacher whose life is turned upside down when his heterosexuality is called into question on national TV. Joan Cusack, Matt Dillon, Debbie Reynolds, the late Wilford Brimley, Bob Newhart and Tom Selleck co-star. Frank Oz ("The Indian in the Cupboard") directs; Paul Rudnick ("Jeffrey", "Addams Family Values") scripts; Scott Rudin ("The First Wives Club") produces. (Paramount, 6/13)

Exploitips: As "Speed 2" and "Con Air" continue to duke it out, mainstream audiences looking for a lighter alternative have only "In and Out" to turn to. Though Oz's works have had on-and-off success, he's backed here by a good comic cast; exhibitors should play up the good-times genre and highlight the talent, including the resurgent Reynolds ("Mother") to pull the mature demo.

Boogie Nights

Set in the heyday of the adult-film world, this dark comedy follows a group of filmmakers hoping to revamp the XXX industry. Mark Wahlberg ("Traveller"), Julianne Moore ("The Lost World"), Burt Reynolds ("Striptease"), Don Cheadle ("Devil in a Blue Dress"), William H. Macy ("Fargo"), Heather Graham ("Drugstore Cowboy") and John C. Reilly ("Hard Eight") star. Sophomore helmer Paul Thomas Anderson (also "Hard Eight") directs, scripts and produces. (New Line, 6/13 wide after 5/23 ltd)

Exploitips: Mainstream audiences looking for less action than "Con Air," less whitebread than "In and Out" and less art than "Ulee's Gold" could find "Boogie Nights" diverting. As it did for "The People vs. Larry Flynt," the XXX setting will draw this extra attention, but the cast talents are also salable.

Batman & Robin

"One Fine Day's" George Clooney takes his turn at "bat" fighting against evil in Gotham City. This time out, Batman and Robin ("The Chamber's" Chris O'Donnell) team with Batgirl ("Clueless'" Alicia Silverstone) to thwart the sinister doings of Mr. Freeze (Arnold Schwarzenegger) and seductress Poison Ivy ("Beautiful Girls'" Uma Thurman). The fourth film in the "Batman" series co-stars John Glover ("Love! Valour! Compassion!) and Elle Macpherson ("If Lucy Fell"). Joel Schumacher, who helmed #3 and will do #5, directs; Akiva Goldsman ("Batman Forever") scripts; Peter Macgregor-Scott produces. See our Sneak Preview in this issue. (Warner, 6/20)

Exploitips: The two-week battle between "Speed 2" and "Con Air" ends 6/20 when the Caped Crusader drops in. "Batman Forever" pulled $184 mil. in 1995, and expectations are for more of the same with the additions of Arnold, Alicia and Uma. As June's second-half slate indicates, even competing studios believe "Batman & Robin" will dominate the mainstream market straight through to 7/2, when "Men In Black" and "Titanic" launch.

Ulee's Gold

Peter Fonda stars as Florida beekeeper Ulee Jackson, a reluctant family patriarch called to arms by his incarcerated son Jimmy (Tom Wood). Ulee must rescue his recovering drug addict daughter-in-law, Helen (Christine Dunford), with the help of his granddaughters and a local nurse (Patricia Richardson of TV's "Home Improvement"). Vanessa Zima and Jessie Biel co-star. Victor Nunez ("Ruby in Paradise" directs and scripts, and he produces with Peter Saraf and Sam Gowan. (Orion Classics, 6/13 NY/LA, exp 6/20 & 6/27)

Exploitips: In a handsome four-star review (April '97 issue), our Sundance critic cited Nunez's "sensitive, delicate portrait" and Fonda's performance of "quiet yet sustained intensity." But the film is "painstakingly slow...before it becomes truly absorbing," making this pure art-house fare. Nunez's "Ruby in Paradise" credit will draw younger specialized auds, and the Fonda name could draw the more mature crowd.

Squeeze

This urban thriller examines the psychological pressures of urban street life on three boys "squeezed" between the influences of a youth worker and of a gang leader. Tyrone Burton, Eddie Cutanda and Phuong Van Duong star (and inspired the story). First-timer Robert Patton-Spruill directs and scripts; Ari Newman, Garen Topalian, Stephanie Danan and Patricia Moreno produce. (Miramax, 6/13)

Love Serenade

This Camera d'Or winner at Cannes tells the story of unwedded twentysomething sisters who feel life is passing them by in their tiny Down Under town. When the ex-drivetime king of big-city Brisbane radio arrives to run the local station, the sisters engage in a comically contentious battle to win his affections. Miranda Otto, Rebecca Frith and George Shevtsov star. Shirley Barrett directs and scripts; Jan Chapman (Oscar winner for "The Piano") produces. (Miramax, 6/20 NY/LA)

Exploitips: Men and their dates will be at "Batman & Robin"; women (especially the more literate) will opt for "Love Serenade." To draw mainstream distaff attention and emphasize the comic angle, exhibitors might use this catchline: "A comedy about two sisters who'll do anything to join the first wives—or any wives—club."

Dream With the Fishes

David Arquette ("Scream") stars as Terry, a young suicidal man who crosses paths with a dying, thrill-seeking stranger, Nick (Brad Hunt). Terry teams with Nick to help him fulfill several unusual fantasies in one last adventurous road trip. Kathryn Erbe, Cathy Moriarty and Allyce Beasley co-star. Screenwriter Finn Taylor ("Pontiac Moon") makes his directing debut; Johnny Wow and Mitchell Stein produce. (Sony Classics, 6/20)

Exploitips: Specialized male moviegoers not drawn to "Batman & Robin" or "Love Serenade" could look toward "Dream With the Fishes," so accentuate the road trip and bonding elements likely to draw that demo.

When the Cat's Away

In this French comedy, an unhappy young woman searches for her lost cat; along the way, she meets a host of diverse characters, and suddenly her life is filled with adventure, intrigue and romance. Garance Clavel, Sinedine Soualem and Renee Le Calm star. Cedric Klapisch directs and scripts; Aissa Djabri, Farid Lahoussa and Manuel Munz produce for Vertigo/France 2. (Sony Classics, 6/20)

Exploitips: As "Love Serenade" draws distaff, and "Dream With the Fishes" draws males, "When the Cat's Away" is for the foreign-language crowd. Our Sundance reviewer (Feb. '97 issue) gave the film a four-star review, calling it "charming without being cloying" and citing its "deft combination of comedy and social awareness."

Deep Crimson

In this dramatic horror film, an aging mother named Coral (Regina Orozco) with insatiable desires answers a lonely-hearts ad and meets a handsome philanderer named Nicolas (Daniel Gimenez Cacho). For his love, Coral abandons her life, her children and her home to help him find women to seduce and rob—but then their dealings turn deadly. Arturo Ripstein ("The Queen of the Night") directs this Mexican/French/Spanish co-production; Paz Alicia Garciadiego scripts; Miguel Necoechea and Paolo Barbachano produce. (New Yorker, 6/20)

Exploitips: To pull the likely art-house auds, try this catchline: "In the tradition of 'Nosferatu' and 'Cronos' comes 'Deep Crimson'."

JUNE 27

Hercules

Disney's 35th full-length animated feature is an epic comedy/adventure from writer/directors John Musker and Ron Clements (the makers of "Aladdin" and "The Little Mermaid") about the legendary half-man/half-god son of Zeus. Raised on Earth, Herc sets out to prove himself a hero so he can return to his Mount Olympus home. But Hades, god of the Underworld, sees Zeus' son as an obstacle to his plans to rule the universe and arranges a number of calamities for him. Danny DeVito, Tate Donovan, Susan Egan, Matt Frewer, Bobcat Goldthwait, Paul Shaffer, Rip Torn, James Woods and Charlton Heston provide the voices; Musker and Clements produce with Alice Dewey ("The Lion King"). (Disney, 6/27)

Exploitips: "The Hunchback of Notre Dame" was considered a boxoffice disappointment, though it cleared the $100 mil. mark (if by just $100,000). What exhibitors want, of course, is another $300 mil. performer like "The Lion King," however unlikely that is. "Hercules" has the audience plus of having an attractive male hero, which "Hunchback" and "Pocahontas" ($141.5 mil.) lacked. Expect a full-court press by Disney to gain theatres and then to pull patrons to those theatres; the film's 6/27 positioning, given the older-drawing competition, is a hospitable clime, setting it up for the long July 4 weekend and the rest of the summer to play to families.

My Best Friend's Wedding

In this romantic comedy, best friends Julianne (Julia Roberts) and Michael ("Kansas City's" Dermot Mulroney) plan to marry each other at age 28 if they haven't found that someone special. Just as Julianne is expecting the inevitable, Michael instead pops the question to beautiful 'n' bubbly Kimmy ("She's the One's" Cameron Diaz), and Julianne finds herself on the wrong side of a romantic triangle. Rupert Everett ("Cemetery Man") and Philip Bosco ("Milk Money") co-star. Aussie P.J. Hogan ("Muriel's Wedding") directs; Ronald Bass ("The Joy Luck Club") scripts, and he produces with Jerry Zucker ("A Walk in the Clouds"). (TriStar, 6/27)

Exploitips: Roberts' fans don't want her in gloomies like "Michael Collins" or "Mary Reilly"; they want her in sunnies like "Pretty Woman," and the trailer for this rom/com seemed to leave exhibitors smiling at ShoWest. Although the narrative is similar to "If Lucy Fell," which fell at the boxoffice for TriStar, the studio thinks the tale will work with star power. And that's the sell: Roberts, smiling.

Talk of Angels

A sort of gender-bender variant on Ken Loach's "Land and Freedom," this PG-13 drama tells the story of a young Irish woman who arrives in Spain on the eve of the country's civil war. Polly Walker ("For Roseanna"), Vincent Perez ("The Crow: City of Angels"), Frances McDormand ("Fargo") and Franco Nero star. Nick Hamm directs; Ann Guedes and Frank McGuinness script; Patrick Cassavetti produces. (Miramax, 6/27)

Exploitips: On one hand, this has elements that could make it one of the month's stronger art-house releases; on the other hand, "Talk of Angels" has long sat on Miramax's clogged to-come slate. (It was first slated for last August and then this April.) Best bets are the date-night college crowd and the usual specialized suspects (the educated 40+ demo).

Gabbeh

As an old woman washes her gabbeh (a patterned Persian carpet) in a river, a young woman named Gabbeh (Shaghayegh Djodat) tells her life story. The delicate fable of true love is interwoven with a documentary-like look at nomadic life in this Iranian-language drama. Abbas Sayah and Hossein Moharami co-star. Mohsen Makhmalbaf directs and scripts; Khalil Daroudtchi and Khalil Mahmoudl produce. (New Yorker, 6/27)

Exploitips: "The White Balloon," also an Iranian production, performed well (in select-site terms) for October Films in early '96. Citing "Gabbeh" as "in the tradition of 'The White Balloon'" would target that specialized demo.

M

In this reissue of Fritz Lang's 1931 German melodrama, Peter Lorre stars as a psychotic child murderer brought to justice by Berlin's organized criminal element. Otto Wernicke, Ellen Widmann, Inge Landgut and Gustav Grundgens co-star. Thea Von Harbou, Paul Falkenberg, Adolf Jansen and Karl Vash script the Nero Film production. (Kino, 6/27)

Exploitips: Perhaps due to the mainstreaming of today's art-house films, reissues of classics like "The Garden of the Finzi-Continis" and "Belle de Jour" have drawn decent specialized numbers. So exhibitors should highlight the 1931 date and the Lang imprimatur to give this event status at the art house.

JUNE UNDATED

Different for Girls

In this romantic comedy, when childhood best friends Paul and Karl meet 20 years later, Paul doesn't recognize his old pal—because Karl has become Kim. The slovenly Paul is attracted to the proper Kim until he learns her true identity; then he decides to wreck Kim's life. "Different for Girls" received the Montreal fest's Grand Prix of the Americas award for best film. Rupert Graves ("Intimate Relations"), Steven Mackintosh ("London Kills Me") and Saskia Reeves ("Butterfly Kiss") star. Richard Spence directs; Tony Marchant scripts; John Chapman produces. (First Look, June)

Exploitips: The gender-bender storyline isn't new, but it continues to draw. Underscoring the Montreal win will help differentiate the film from its art-house competitors.

The Tit and the Moon

In this Spanish-language comedy, Tete (Biel Duran) is a Catalonian boy who has a sibling problem: He feels neglected when mom breastfeeds his newborn brother. After seeing the naked breast of a French ballerina ("Becoming Collette's" Mathilda May), he becomes fixated on that female body part. Gerard Damon co-stars. Bigas Luna ("Jamon Jamon") directs, and he scripts with Cuca Canals; A.V. Gomez produces. (Strand, June)

Exploitips: Our Telluride reviewer (Nov. '95 issue) gave the latest Luna 2 1/2 stars, saying "The Tit and the Moon" is "like two European movies that don't mesh": Although Luna's usual lusty Spaniards are entertaining, two key French characters are heavy-handedly cerebral. Still, Luna's fans (however limited in numbers stateside) are likely to forgive the latter as long as he provides the former.

Midaq Alley

Based on the Egyptian novel by Nobel winner Naguib Mahfouz, this Mexican drama ranges from 1940s Cairo to modern downtown Mexico City as it blends the stories of three characters: middle-aged family man Rutilio (Ernesto Gomez Cruz), who experiences first-time homosexual feelings that lead to domestic disaster; beautiful Alma ("Fools Rush In's" Salma Hayek), whose paramour goes to America to make money to marry her; and spinster landlady Susanita (Margarita

LATE MOVIE MOVES INTO MAY ...

COLOR OF A BRISK AND LEAPING DAY

In this end-of-WWII drama, a young man with a passion for trains pursues his dream to save the Yosemite Valley Railroad. Meanwhile, he carries on an incestuous relationship with his younger sister and develops a homoerotic relationship with another man. Peter Alexander, Jeri Arredondo, Henry Gibson and Michael Stipe star. Christopher Munch directs and scripts; Andrea Sperling ("nowhere") produces. (Artistic License, 5/2 NY)

Exploitips: Our Sundance reviewer (April '95 issue) gave this just 1 1/2 stars, saying: "beautiful but languid, this expansive travelogue and heavy historical story would have fared better as a coffee table book." But the film's Sundance prize (for cinematography) will draw attention, as will Munch's previous "The Hours and Time" credit. Co-star Stipe is the lead singer of rock band R.E.M.

NOWHERE

Dark ("The Doom Generation's" James Duval) is infatuated with the end of the world and bisexual Mel ("The Craft's" Rachel True), who carries on with Dark and girlfriend Lucifer (Kathleen Robertson). Chiara Mastroianni ("Three Lives and Only One Death") and Debi Mazar co-star. Gregg Araki directs and scripts; he produces with Andrea Sperling and France's Why Not Prods. (Fine Line, 5/9)

Exploitips: Advanced from 8/22, this manic and melancholic film touts itself as a supersaturated "Beverly Hills, 90210" on acid and features cameo appearances by John Ritter, Beverly D'Angelo, Shannen Doherty and Traci Lords. Like all of Araki's canon, "nowhere" won't play anywhere close to mainstream tastes; expect strongest support from gay moviegoers.

TWIN TOWN

In Swansea, South Wales, a roofing contractor (William Thomas) tries to avoid paying compensation to his worker Fatty (Huw Ceredig) injured on the job. But Fatty's wicked twin sons (Rhys Ifans and LLyr Evans) are ready for revenge in this black comedy. Debut director Kevin Allen also co-scripts with Paul Durden; Peter McAleese produces; Andrew MacDonald and Danny Boyle (the "Shallow Grave" and "Trainspotting" duo) executive produce. (Gramercy, 5/9 NY/LA)

Exploitips: Our Berlin fest critic gives "Twin Town" 2 1/2 stars, saying watching the movie "is a bit like savoring a bad smell"—the plotline is ordinary, the humor is blunt and sick, and the characters are "lewd, rude, duplicitous...," yet the acting and filmmaking have energy and the film "speaks a universal language about human small-mindedness and resilience." Especially after "Trainspotting," the most obvious sells are MacDonald and Boyle.

UNDERWORLD

This noir thriller follows an ex-con (Denis Leary) with a twisted sense of vengeance who starts a vendetta against those who mob-hit his father. Joe Mantegna, Annabella Sciorra, Abe Vigoda and former XXX actress Traci Lords co-star. Roger Christian (who won a set-decoration Oscar for "Star Wars") directs; Larry Bishop ("Mad Dog Time") scripts; Robert Vince and William Vince produce. (Legacy, 5/9 ltd)

Exploitips: "Underworld" had been on the slate of the increasingly hesitant Trimark. Our Ft. Lauderdale fest critic in a one-star review (April 1997 issue) called this a "derivative devil" worshipping "at the 'Pulp Fiction' altar." But that testosterone content is the most marketable element, along with the "many scantily clad females and strippers" for the male demo.

PLAYING GOD

A famous L.A. surgeon ("Kalifornia's" David Duchovny) loses his medical license after performing an operation while on amphetamines. Hired by a ruthless criminal ("Beautiful Girls'" Timothy Hutton), he becomes a "gunshot doctor" and is attracted to the criminal's moll ("Hackers'" Angelina Jolie); the doctor then faces a choice of destiny. Andy Wilson directs; Mark Haskell Smith scripts; Marc Abraham and Laura Bickford produce for Touchstone. (Buena Vista, 5/16)

Exploitips: Though not a clash of the titans, "Playing God"—which Buena Vista had slated for this fall—now goes drama-vs.-drama against Paramount's "Night Falls on Manhattan," itself once slated for fall (but '96). Paramount has the bigger film star in Andy Garcia, but Buena Vista can tout Duchovny's popularity from his turn on TV's "The X-Files."

NIGHT FALLS ON MANHATTAN

A cop-turned-DA (Andy Garcia) faces personal and professional betrayal when he learns a cover-up might involve those closest to him. Richard Dreyfuss and Lena Olin co-star for writer/director Sidney Lumet; Thom Mount and Josh Kramer produce for Spelling. (Paramount, 5/16)

Exploitips: At the studio's ShoWest event, Garcia garnered laughs when he said he was making a "farewell speech," in that his film was going against "The Lost World" (actually arriving a week later). But "Night Falls on Manhattan" now collides with "Playing God," meaning a likely split of serious-film mainstreamers. "Night Falls on Manhattan" is based on the Robert Daley novel "Tainted Evidence," so a bookstore tie-in could pay dividends.

THE VAN

This third adaptation of novelist Roddy Doyle's Barrytown trilogy, about two men who run a fish 'n' chips van, reteams director Stephen Frears ("The Snapper") with producer Lynda Myles and star Colm Meaney (both of whom also did "The Commitments"). Donal O'Kelly co-stars. As before, Doyle adapts. (Fox Searchlight, 5/23)

Exploitips: This threequel has a built-in audience. Still, Frears + Meaney = art-house auds unless reviews create crossover mainstream support (but see our two-star review, Aug. 1996 issue).

Sanz), who dreams of wedded life. A fourth section picks up the stories two years later. Jorge Fons directs; Vincente Lenero adapts; Alfredo Ripstein Jr. produces. (Northern Arts, June)

Exploitips: The film's anthology nature and Egyptian heritage make it a specialized specialized film—which is Northern Arts' specialty. Mahfouz's Nobel win is probably more citable for art-house auds than is the Hayek credit, though that can't hurt.

Twisted

This contempo homosexual variant on "Oliver Twist" set in New York follows a homeless orphan (Keivyn McNeil Graves) brought into the "stable" of Andre (William Hickey); there, he finds a brotherly friend in Angel (David Norona) and an ally in tough drag queen Shiniqua (Billy Porter). But Angel's abusive lover, Eddie (Anthony Crivelo), takes a disliking to the orphan. Seth Michael Donsky makes his feature directing debut; Donskey also scripts, and he produces with Adrian Agramonte. (Leisure Time Features, June)

Exploitips: "Twisted" is likely to do best in the largest cities with a gay community; expect the same audience, if in lesser numbers, that attended "johns."

The Last Time I Commited Suicide

This drama is based on a letter written to beat icon Jack Kerouac from Neal Cassady, the man who inspired Keroauc's "On the Road." Set in the early '50s, the story follows Cassady (Thomas Jane) in the days before he met the famed writer. Keanu Reeves, Tom Bower, Adrien Brody ("King of the Hill"), John Doe ("Roadside Prophets"), Claire Forlani ("Basquiat") and Marg Helgenberger ("Species") co-star. Stephen Kay ("Intimate Power") directs and scripts; Edward Bates and Louise Rosner produce. (Roxie)

Exploitips: This "artsploitation" effort boasts something of a name cast but is likely to draw only the specialized demo. A cross-promo with a bookstore that's heavy on Kerouac would reach that literate audience.

Mondo Plympton

This anthology provides a retrospective look at the wild and comic worlds created by animator Billy Plympton, whose work was last seen on the big screen in 1992's "The Tune." (Cinema Village, June)

Exploitips: Like British claymation master Nick Park ("Wallace & Gromit"), Plympton has a small (perhaps smaller) but devoted following. To pull animation fans, try an MTV or Cartoon Network cross-promo with your local cable TV operator.

REELIN' AND ROCKIN'

A seismic shift in projection techniques comes about as the 6,000-foot reel heads to market by Pat Kramer

At last, the path has been cleared for a technological advance that will not only improve the quality and longevity of film prints but also specifically benefit exhibitors across the nation and worldwide. After a quarter-century of batting the idea around, NATO board members this year endorsed a plan to begin converting film reels from the standard 2,000-foot length to the 6,000-foot extended-length reels (ELRs). This spring, ELRs—displayed at ShoWest and to be on view at ShowCanada—will begin arriving in projection booths.

The new format is expected to improve film presentation (due to fewer splices), increase the longevity of prints (less wear and tear), and most importantly save valuable makeup and breakdown time in the projection booth. Despite the advantages, it's been a long time coming. "This is something the board has discussed for some 25 years," says William F. Kartozian, president of NATO. "We were getting somewhat jaded by it but were pleasantly surprised when it became apparent it was going to happen."

A MAN WHO MADE IT HAPPEN: Warner Bros. distribution president Barry Reardon with an extended-length reel and one of its 2,000-foot predecessors.

Much credit for the breakthrough, Kartozian says, goes to Barry Reardon, president of domestic theatrical distribution at Warner Bros. "It's finally on track, thanks to Barry," Kartozian says. Although, due to last-minute fine-tuning, Warner Bros. was not able as planned to roll out "Selena" on a 100-theatre test of the ELR, the studio is considering giving its April 11 release "Murder at 1600" the honor.

Warner Bros. isn't the only distributor eager to make ELRs the reel of choice. New Line Cinema will start using the 6,000-foot reel on 200 prints of its May 2 release, "Austin Powers: International Man of Mystery." Harold Goldberg, Universal's vice president of print control, says his studio is also interested in using the ELRs but is waiting to see how Warner's experience goes before committing.

The ELR means exhibitors save time and money, but it means added costs for distributors. "That's part of the reason this changeover has taken so long," Kartozian says. "It was known that this could be done, but there's always a certain resistance to change—and the changeover was not going to be without cost. While the exhibitors get a great benefit by this, the principal expense is going to be borne by the studios. So we had to work out a formula pursuant to which the studios would be reimbursed a part of their costs on a fair basis."

According to Warner's Reardon, that's an extra $5 per shipment for the first two years that the new reels and their protective cases are on the market. After that time, it will be the studios' responsibility to bear any added expense. Says Al Shapiro, New Line's senior executive vice president and general sales manager, "It's going to cost us a lot to convert the film, but we think the time has come for us to help the theatre owner make sure that the pictures on the screen are presented properly."

With the introduction of the new reels, exhibitors will see an immediate benefit in presentation. Whereas the 2,000-ft. reels require five or more reel changes for a standard feature, two 6,000-ft. reels can accommodate most feature films. As an example, Reardon cites the case of a projectionist he met in Las Vegas during ShoWest, who told him that on Thursday evenings he often works until 4 a.m. breaking down six or seven films into the 2,000-foot format and putting them back in the cans for the weekly changeover at his 12-screen multiplex. With 6,000-foot reels, Reardon says, "when you open our case and pull the reel out, you just put it up on the platter, loop it through, put one splice in it—and you're in business. The same thing happens when you're breaking it down.

"That's really a huge savings in the projection booth," Reardon says. "We figure it's about 20 to 25 minutes per feature [of time saved], putting it together and breaking it down."

Adds New Line's Shapiro, "We think the 6,000-foot reels will help ensure that the prints you see on the screen in theatres across the country are in pristine condition, as much as is humanly possible, because they're not going to be touched as much and they're not going to get scratched as much. By eliminating the need for splices and in some cases cue markers, the audience can enjoy a film without being pulled out of it by bad prints. The 6,000-foot reels will go a long way toward ensuring that the films remain in good condition for a long period of time."

the ELR and its casing with input from Inter-Society president Larry Jacobson (president of LJ Technologies) and Robert Pinkston, vice president of projection and sound at United Artists Theatre Circuit. Each maker was asked to submit six samples of an ELR case prototype, which then underwent a series of rigorous laboratory tests for impact and durability. The tests were created to mirror the conditions the destination, exhibitors were asked to evaluate the ELRs on different qualities. In the end, each of the manufacturer's cases was found to have flaws. It was at that time that Circular Motion came into the picture, submitting to Warner Bros. its prototype plastic case, durable enough to withstand damage but lightweight enough for easy transport. The studio independently tested the Circular Motion case and found it to

To help exhibitors with the changeover, NATO has distributed bulletins to its membership, informing those who don't have platter systems about the modifications they will need to make. Overall, the changeover will be a gradual one, with prints initially shipping in both standard and ELR formats.

The cases for the new reels are being manufactured for Warner Bros. and New Line by Circular Motion Products, a plastics manufacturer that's been producing cores, hubs and cases for Warner Bros. for many years. Circular Motion's plastic case accommodates a 24 3/4-inch diameter reel (which can actually hold 7,000 feet of film, allowing for inclusion of trailers or other pre-feature materials) and, like its smaller predecessor, has a handle for carrying. Made of plastic, a case and reel together weigh about 65 pounds (less than the weight of three standard-size reels). Its split-reel format has a four-inch core in the middle for mounting film; two plastic flanges snap around the reel to secure it to the core. In short, the new format is designed for ease of usage.

Winning the contract to be the exclusive maker for Warner Bros. and New Line was quite an accomplishment for Circular Motion, a small Downey, Calif. company, in that it won out over five larger manufacturers for the job. Although Circular Motion has long manufactured cases for the 2,000-foot reel, it was not among the original group of manufacturers (Technicolor, Hollywood, Logistical, Goldberg and Bose) that presented prototypes in March 1996.

The process began back in early 1996, when NATO's Technical Advancement Committee—presided over by J. Wayne Anderson, president and COO of Maryland-based R/C Theatres (and ShoWest's B.V. Sturdivant Award winner)—developed specifications for cases would undergo during normal transit from distributors to exhibitors.

"The interesting thing about the test is that, as rigorous as it was, all five passed the laboratory test," says Jacobson. "But only two survived a [subsequent] field test." The field trial involved two dozen theatre circuits, which tested the ELRs for functionality and ease of usage. (A sign of industry interest in the project, participating circuits included Marcus, Sony, Hoyts, Carmike, UATC, General Cinema, Cinamerica, AMC, National Amusements, Syufy, Pacific, ACT III, Metropolitan, Edwards, Harkins, Wehrenberg, Cinemark, Cineplex, Eastern Federal, Cobb, Fox, Malco, Regal, R/C, Kerasotes, Goodrich and Dickinson.)

NO MYSTERY: Audiences of New Line's "Austin Powers: International Man of Mystery" will see cleaner presentations thanks to the ELR.

Three film-carrier companies—NFS, ETS and TES—shipped the ELRs back and forth to the circuits, further testing durability. At each meet all the specifications. At $100 per case, Circular Motion's product was also much less expensive than those of its competitors.

Says Circular Motion's Cesar Fernandez, "It's a great honor to do this type of thing and have the acceptance of [the studios]. When we look at the 6,000-foot reel, what we see is a plastic part—not that we are selling to Warner Bros. and so the price should be going up. We have been manufacturing plastic parts for a long time. When we became exclusive for the motion picture industry, we already had experience in plastic parts, so we are able to provide quality at a price."

In looking back on how long it's taken the ELR innovation to receive widespread approval, Inter-Society's Jacobson says, "There've been a lot of people involved in the process, but what truly made it happen is the fact that Barry Reardon wanted the ELR. Someone needs to get credit for pulling it off, and that person is Barry." R/C's Anderson also acknowledges the early efforts of the late Bud Rifkin, co-founder of Cinema Centers and former president and CEO of Hoyts. As chairman of NATO's technical committee in the early 1970s (and later as president of NATO), Rifkin was a pioneer in trying to bring ELRs to the exhibition industry.

Reflecting on the present-day milestone with Warner and New Line's introduction of the 6,000-foot reel, Anderson says, "Bud would have a big smile on his face if he could see this. He tried very hard, early on, to get this started back in the '70s. That was one of his lifelong endeavors, trying to get this through." NATO's Kartozian sums it up by saying, "I think that it's great that we're moving into the 20th century—even though we're so close to the 21st! I just think it's great that we finally got it accomplished."

A View From the Capital

by Dina Lebo
Co-Chair
ShowCanada

Each year the ShowCanada convention takes on the flavor of the region where it is being held, and this year is no exception. Ottawa being Canada's capital city, our opening night gala on Tuesday, May 6 will feature an astounding array of the nation's political "who's who," as well as a truly Canadian spectacle featuring the Ottawa footguards, whom tourists see in the summer at the changing of the guard ceremonies in front of the Parliament buildings. The footguards will thrill delegates with their stage version of "the coming together of the provinces," complete with provincial flags, at the grandiose Museum of Civilization in Hull, Quebec.

The Ottawa region is also known as Canada's Silicon Valley because of the many high-tech companies that are located in the area. We've incorporated a tour of several of these facilities into our Friday morning seminar series, which we've called Technical Tours. Those who are interested will have the opportunity to tour Corel Corporation, which is recognized worldwide as an award-winning developer and marketer of PC graphics and multi-media software; the General Assembly Production Centre, a unique, state-of-the-art video, audio multimedia production center; Animatics, a young, upbeat media company creating interactive worlds of sound and light; and the New Multimedia Centre, which has a range of digital equipment.

As organizers of the convention, we try to maintain a balance of activities, with a program that includes seminars, screenings, a growing trade show, and gala events, while also showing off some of the region's highlights. Our opening gala will take place at the Museum of Civilization in Hull, Quebec, and we'll be visiting the new casino in Hull. We'll also be attending a seminar at the IMAX theatre in Hull and screenings at Famous Players' Rideau Centre Cinemas and Cineplex Odeon's World Exchange Cinemas in Ottawa. Our gala evenings will take place at the Westin Hotel and the Ottawa Conference Centre in the heart of downtown Ottawa, and we are looking into an event at the Parliament buildings as well.

Besides our themed evening events (we've got a costumed Mardi Gras night, and we're working on our own Circus-Circus evening), the gala opening night ceremonies with the Show-Canada Showmanship Awards promises to again be one of the highlights of the convention, as 22 theatre managers will be honored in an award ceremony highlighting their work in film promotions, concessions, and audience development over the last 12 months.

This award contest is among the biggest in North America. We now have six categories with three prize winners in each category. Showmanship is alive and well and growing in Canada. This year, we should receive over 120 entries as part of the award competition. Our new Blockbuster award will be given for the best promotion of a major "blockbuster" film. This will be differentiated from our Showmanship Award category for smaller films. As always, we have awards for the best promotion for a Canadian film in French and a Canadian film in English, as well as our audience development award, which is given for programs centered on how a specific theatre interacts with its community—blood donor clinics, food drives, et cetera. We also give out prizes for the best promotions surrounding concessions sales.

ShowCanada '97: May 6-10 Ottawa, Ontario

Two different kinds of awards that we give out are for the highest-grossing Canadian film, which this year was David Cronenberg's "Crash," and for Canadian Director of the Year, which will also go to Cronenberg.

There are many new developments happening in the film industry, and our seminar series will focus on these changes and bring exhibitors up to date on the new realities. As we speak, 6,000-foot reels are becoming a reality. Warner Bros. is releasing the Wesley Snipes starrer "Murder at 1600" in the U.S. using the new format, and New Line will follow suit with the comedy "Austin Powers: International Man of Mystery" (which stars Canadian Mike Myers of "Wayne's World" fame). Canadian releases using the 6,000-foot reel are planned for the summer. We will have representatives from InterSociety on hand so that Canadian exhibitors can ask questions and see the new cases first-hand.

As organizers of the convention, we try to maintain a balance of activities, with a program that includes seminars, screenings, a growing trade show, and gala events, while also showing off some of the region's highlights.

Also, United Artists Theatres and Todd-AO Corp. have created a compact print and are now demonstrating it across the country. The improvement of 30 frames per second from 24 frames gives a 14 percent better picture quality and better contrast resolution because of the absence of flicker. We hope to have a demonstration for exhibitors to see this new process.

And last but not least, Disney University is coming up to ShowCanada with its seminar on customer service—Disney-style. We welcome one and all and hope that you all enjoy a view from the capital!

Entertainment, Information and Inspiration

by Cathy Watson
President
Motion Picture Theatre Associations of Canada

On behalf of the Motion Picture Theatre Associations of Canada, I would like to welcome everyone to our nation's capital, Ottawa, Ontario. This year's ShowCanada convention is being held at the historical and beautiful Chateau Laurier hotel in the heart of downtown Ottawa. Our May 6 to 10 calendar of events should afford us all an opportunity to see this great city in full bloom of tulips and other sure signs of spring. We have moved our dates this year to better accommodate our industry and allow our colleagues to work on Monday and attend the convention from Tuesday to Friday. Anyone wishing to stay over on the Saturday night can enjoy a day at the end of the convention when everyone will have had a chance to get acquainted with the city and its wealth of tourism opportunities.

On Tuesday, May 6, we will be holding the annual Pioneer Golf Tournament, which is held each ShowCanada at the finest courses across the nation. We always have a great turn-out of golfers, and anyone can join in the fun.

Our opening ceremonies will once again be a spectacular show, this year with a "Changing of the Guards" theme, which will be followed by our renowned ShowCanada Showmanship Awards. Showmanship is alive and thriving in our great country, and we recognize and reward our ever-growing list of most deserving recipients.

This year's seminars include technical updates, including the new 6,000-foot reels, big-screen light measurements and the Compact Distribution Print. Another of our featured seminars is the Disney University Customer Service forum. This is a most informative and inspiring seminar that should not be missed.

After being completely motivated and extremely informed, our delegates will also enjoy numerous meals and entertainment that will be hosted by our friends from distribution, exhibition, and our many suppliers. This year's trade show has been sold out for some time and once again we will be hosting an exhibitor relations forum with the distributors available to speak to us and address any concerns at this time.

ShowCanada is now in its 11th year, and we are very proud of its growth. I would like to acknowledge the hard work of ShowCanada co-chair Carole Boudreault and her team, and Dina Lebo, executive director of the Motion Picture Theatre Associations of Canada, for their dedication and organizing of ShowCanada 1997, and the many others who have devoted their time and effort to help make this convention a success. We look forward to seeing you in Ottawa.

Raising Canada's Profile

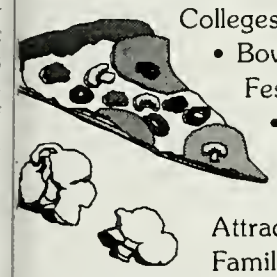
by Dan Johnson
President and Chief Executive Officer
Canadian Association of Film Distributors and Exporters

The Canadian Association of Film Distributors and Exporters (CAFDE) is proud to be a co-sponsor of ShowCanada '97. Each year this event gets even better at raising the profile of the theatrical sector and assisting people working in the business to keep on top of the latest industry developments in customer service, marketing, sales and new technology.

We also appreciate the opportunity to acknowledge our productive partnership with Canada's theatrical exhibitors. The work distributors and exhibitors do together to encourage Canadians to emerge from their cocoons and take in a show at the cinema is fundamental to the prosperity of the moving picture business today. There's no doubt that a successful theatrical release increases the value of the film in relation to all other media.

The eight members of the Canadian Association of Film Distributors and Exporters (CAFDE)—Alliance Vivafilm/Releasing, Coscient/Astral, CFP Distribution Inc., Cineplex Odeon Films, Film Tonic, MaloFilm Distribution, NorStar Releasing Inc., and TSC Film Distribution—are pleased to collaborate with the members of the Motion Picture Theatre Associations of Canada (MPTAC) in activities which promote Canadian culture and Canadian films. Canadian Project Pictures is a publicity plan to use donated on-screen trailer time, posters, and point-of-purchase promotional material in theatre lobbies to raise the public's name-recognition of the excellent Canadian films available throughout the year. Recently, we utilized the Canadian Project Pictures strategy to raise patriotism through a National Flag Day public service campaign. Canadian distributors and exhibitors lit up the screen like fireworks light up Parliament Hill on the 1st of July when we marked National Flag Day on screens across the country with promotional trailers in tribute to Canadian Heritage's flag-waving initiative.

In addition to an interest in national pride, CAFDE has a stake in seeing the number of Canadian films exhibited increase. Our mandate is to foster and promote the health of the Canadian motion picture industry by strengthening the distribution and export sector. To accomplish this task, CAFDE works to improve the commercial viability of Canadian films and their effective distribution and export in Canada and abroad. In addition, we seek to improve the economic viability of the Canadian distribution sector by establishing Canada as a commercially-distinct market from the U.S.



The achievements we have made in film distribution and exhibition in Canada are not only founded in private-sector ambition and entrepreneurism, but also on public-sector partnership. Given that symbiotic relationship, it's significant that ShowCanada '97 is launching its second decade in the nation's capital.

Partnerships between distributors and exhibitors and between the private and public sector have brought us to this place in time. With one more ShowCanada under our belt, we'll be even better prepared to forge ahead.

A CAPITAL IDEA

In addition to the usual exhibition convention activities, ShowCanada '97 explores Ottawa's historic, multicultural treasures by Christine James CAPITAL GAINS: ShowCanada '97's host hotel, The Chateau Laurier, in Ottawa, Ontario.

At ShowCanada '96 in Banff, Alberta, conventioneers received golden pins in the shape of the House of Parliament as a teaser for the '97 convention already in the works. Come Tuesday, May 6, the anticipated 450-500 attendees of the Great White Show will get to see the real thing. Located this year in the Canadian capital of Ottawa, Ontario, ShowCanada will offer guests a view of the famed gubernatorial center from the windows of Chateau Laurier, a prestigious hotel located next to Parliament Hill. And that's just the beginning of an agenda that incorporates a fun crash-course in Canadian history and culture, neatly interwoven between customary convention events such as a trade show, themed meals and informative seminars.

While the main focus will of course be the Canadian exhibition industry, ShowCanada's organizers decided to take advantage of the migrating convention's current site by exploring the multitudinous heritage-themed attractions the Ottawa area has to offer. Over its 11 years of existence, seven cities have hosted ShowCanada: Kananaskis, Alberta; Toronto, Ontario; Halifax, Nova Scotia; Whistler, British Columbia; Winnipeg, Manitoba; Quebec City, Quebec; and the aforementioned Banff, Alberta. One of the benefits of having a traveling convention is the new splendors to be discovered in each host province, adding an element of adventure to this industry gathering.

"I think it's great!" says Dina Lebo, co-chair of ShowCanada '97 and executive director of the Motion Picture Theatre Associations of Canada, regarding the show's nomadism. "I think it's wonderful. You get to see other parts of Canada, and experience unique cultural experiences which come out of the region where you're going. Many people have not done grand tours of Canada, and this convention, moving from place to place, allows them to see the country. It allows them to get a feel for the other provinces, and the high points and the highlights of living in different provinces across the country.

"Ottawa is wonderful because of the number of buildings and different kinds of architectural experiences," says Lebo. "As the national capital, [Ottawa is] very accustomed to having large-scale conventions, and therefore there are a lot of different sites that can be used."

About half of the scheduled destinations are located in neighboring Hull, Quebec. One might wonder why the show would travel outside its host province, even if it's just across the bridge to Hull.

"The theme is called 'A View From the Capital,' and most Canadians, [let alone] most Americans, don't understand that the capital experience is really Ottawa and Hull," explains Lebo. "The capital experience takes you back and forth between the two. It's called the capital region. Half the government buildings are in Hull, half are in Ottawa. You just drive over the bridge. [The intent of the show's theme], A View From the Capital, is to give conventioneers a unique perspective of how their country functions.

"Because you go between Ontario and Quebec, you go between English and French," Lebo adds. "Ottawa is the home of Franglais, which is that new language where you talk in English and then tout d'accord, on change a Francais, and then we change back again. Ottawa is the bilingual city that is held up as the Canadian model."

Lebo will honor the bilingual nature of Canada at the convention by speaking in both languages. "I will greet people and welcome them in French and English. You'll see the [notifications reading] 'We're meeting at the bus in 10 minutes down at the back door,' that will be done in French and English. Because we are going to be spending time in both Quebec and Ontario, that is the Canadian experience. It's a multi-cultural country with two founding fathers. And the capital region reflects that."

This year, ShowCanada has changed its dates to begin on a Tuesday and end on a Friday in response to attendees' requests. "The opening cocktail party used to be Saturday night, and the convention ended Wednesday night," says Lebo. "The problem with that was Monday is booking day, and distributors and exhibitors were in their rooms virtually all day Monday and did not participate in the activities. So we were asked whether we could do anything about that. And the other thing people were saying was that 'You keep us so busy that we don't have a chance to see the place where you've taken us to, except in going here and there to your activities.' So this year is our first experiment shifting the whole convention so that it starts Tuesday night. Tuesday's Golf Day, so those people who want to play golf can come up Monday night. And by ending it Friday night, if they stay over Saturday night, they get the deep airfare discounts, and Saturday is their day to do whatever it is they want."

ABOVE: The Museum of Civilization in Hull, Quebec will be the site of the opening night festivities. BELOW: An exhibit from the museum's Canada Hall, which depicts the country's history.

Far from being merely an extended city tour, ShowCanada '97 has a rigorous schedule planned filled with seminars and information exchanges pertaining to new industry-shaking developments, interspliced with festivities that will celebrate the fun, creative, magical side of exhibition. On opening night, the convention's annual Showmanship Awards ceremony will honor 22 theatre managers in the categories of film promotions, concessions and audience development. Awards will also be given for the highest-grossing Canadian film (which this year is "Crash") and Canadian Director of the Year ("Crash's" David Cronenberg). This event will take place at Hull's Museum of Culture and Civilization, "which is a gorgeous, Indian-themed building," says Lebo. "The dining room is shaped like a canoe." Prior to the award ceremony, conventioneers will be entertained in Canada Hall, the museum's interactive Canadian history exhibit. "[There are] high-tech wax figures that speak, and they tell the history of Canada," says Lebo. "What's very interesting is our opening night cocktail party will be held in the exhibit, which is kind of like a pioneer village. It's indoors, and it [depicts] Upper and Lower Canada, which was basically what Ontario and Quebec were called before they became Ontario and Quebec. They have a model of streets from Quebec and from Ontario. And the cocktail party will be held in there. There will be people in costumes giving out hors d'oeuvres and cider.

"People can take their time—we're allowing 45 minutes for them to saunter through the exhibit. Those people who aren't turned on by things like that can rush through in 30 seconds and drink at the bar," she adds with a laugh. "We want to show conventioneers the history of their country and the capital, and do things that they wouldn't be able to do in another site—really take advantage of the capital region, in terms of seeing the best in the architecture and learning the most about our country."

Other events will include a trade show with 25 booths in addition to 10 exhibitor relation booths; seminars on Canadian boxoffice performance and on emerging technologies such as the 6,000-foot reel and the Compact Distribution Print; advance movie screenings; and a tour of multimedia and production companies. ShowCanada is also proud to offer for the first time a condensed version of the renowned training course offered by Disney University. "Both Cineplex and Famous send a lot of their managers and their district supervisors down to Disney University in Orlando," says Lebo. "Disney developed its own training center to train the staff of Disneyland, Disneyworld, everything that's Disney. What they found is that because of the Disney attitude and the Disney style of customer service, it was considered very attractive for people outside of the Disney family. IBM sends its managers, even the Navy sends its managers." The week-long training courses held at Disneyworld will be compressed to two hours for ShowCanada, and will be held the morning of Thursday, May 8.

And that's not all. A Casino Night is planned at the Casino De Hull, plus a New Orleans-flavored Circus Circus event will end the convention on a giddily festive note. "We were looking for something that was like French and English, and somebody came up with New Orleans!" recounts Lebo. "And we thought there's a lot we can do with that, you know, Bourbon Street and Carnival Time and Mardi Gras." Convivial conventioneers will be expected to garb themselves appropriately. "Oh, this is fun," says Lebo excitedly. "As they enter into the space that's allocated for Mardi Gras, there are going to be boxes of accessories, hats and wigs and scarves and boas, and they will be expected to costume themselves," she explains.

With all these attractions, Lebo feels ShowCanada '97 will be an event to be remembered. "[Conventioneers will] have a good time in Ottawa, they'll have a better knowledge of how business is done in the capital and what the capital is about. And they'll get first-hand, updated information on what's happening [industry-wide]. What's really exciting is putting together something that's going to be educational and informative, and offer people a great time in great surroundings."

CUT TO THE QUICK

Canada's Future in Film Production is Threatened as the Industry Suffers Severe Subsidy Cuts

by Shlomo Schwartzberg
BOXOFFICE Canadian Correspondent

If one were to judge by Canada's presence at the 1996 Cannes Film Festival, the state of the Canadian film industry would seem to be a healthy one. David Cronenberg's long-awaited "Crash" created waves in competition, and won a special Jury prize for its "audacity." Rising young Toronto filmmaker Srinivas Krishna unveiled his second film, "Lulu," in the Un Certain Regard section of the festival. Quebec director Pierre Gang debuted with "Sous-Sol" in the prestigious Critic's Week. With the presence of acclaimed director Atom Egoyan ("Exotica") on the Cannes jury, Canada's filmmaking community was high-profile and well-represented, giving the impression that all is well on Canada's filmmaking front.

Bruce McDonald's mockumentary "Hard Core Logo" was supposed to be co-financed by Ontario and British Columbia, but the film's producers had to scramble for financing at the last minute when the OFDC's film investment program was frozen.

The reality in Canada is different. Films are still being made and shown at local film festivals, but provincial funding cutbacks, lack of access to Canadian screens, and, more often than not, disinterest on the part of the Canadian public in local product, may be imperiling the future of Canadian cinema.

Most worrisome is what's happening in Ontario, Canada's largest province and home to Toronto, which, along with Montreal, accounts for the bulk of the country's local filmmaking. The ascension of a fiscally conservative provincial government in June 1995 saw a freeze of the Ontario Film Development Corporation (OFDC)'s C$6 million (US$4.2 million) budget for film funding, which was known as the Ontario Film Investment Program. That program was never revived.

"There's less money for direct investment. There's no getting around that at all," says Alexandra Raffe, chief executive officer of the OFDC. "It has changed the landscape a little in terms of the kinds of feature films that are likely to be made. Telefilm Canada will continue to be able to relate to the more commercial end of the feature spectrum where there is an ability from the producer to collect serious pre-sale or foreign money. [But] there will be far more of the very low-budget features that tend to get made in the States, that will get made in Quebec, in the C$300-600,000 (US$210-414,000) range. First-timers will be increasingly working in that kind of budget range rather then the $1-1.5 million (US$700,000-1 million) that they might [have had in the past]."

Alexandra Raffe, chief executive officer of the Ontario Film Development Corp.

And those Canadian newcomers will be financially disadvantaged compared to their predecessors, says Piers Handling, executive director of the Toronto International Film Festival and the man who in 1984 launched the festival's Perspective Canada, the popular annual program which showcases the best in Canadian cinema. "There is a widening gap between established filmmakers like Atom Egoyan and David Cronenberg, who will continue to make their films and will be financed, and young first-time filmmakers, who have no real place to go in the same way that they used to."

The Ontario government did institute some changes for the better even as they cut back on direct funding. Ontario producers can now avail themselves of a tax credit, which allows them to write off 15 percent of their eligible labor expenses, up to 48 percent of the film's total budget, which works out to 7.2 percent of the entire budget. That's an improvement on the previous OFIP system, which resulted in some films getting more rebates than others. "The tax credit is absolutely automatic," says Raffe. "It's available to absolutely everybody [and there is] a doubled rate for first-time filmmakers, double the 15 percent. I was pleased with [the government's] recognition that's it's bloody hard [for first-time filmmakers] to get started."

Alberta also faces a harsh fiscal reality as the 15-year-old Alberta Motion Picture Development Corporation (AMPDC) received its last C$300,000 (US$207,000) grant from the conservative government, thus threatening all local film production in the province. (The AMPDC invested $1.3 million in Alberta productions in 1995. About five to eight feature films are shot there each year.) "Right now as it stands there's nothing for next year," says Margaret Mardirossian, president of the Alberta Motion Picture Industries Association (AMPIA), which lobbies for the industry. Her organization is in current discussions with the government to try to change the funding situation. "We're trying to find a way of bringing forth a favorable business climate for the industry here. I think they recognize the fact that we're at a bit of a disadvantage," adds Mardirossian, pointing to other provinces that are up-and-coming in terms of indigenous production. "Nova Scotia is doing really well." (That province announced C$17 million [US$11.7 million] worth of Canadian film and television production in 1995, and has also begun to attract Hollywood films, such as "The Scarlet Letter" and "Dolores Claiborne"). Alberta, on the other hand, lost an estimated $22 million in film and television projects in the last year due to a lack of financial incentives for film production companies, according to the AMPIA.

Even in the French-speaking province of Quebec, where culture has political implications and local film funding is still sacrosanct, traditional audiences for Quebecois films seem to be dwindling, says Francois Macerola, executive director of Telefilm Canada.

"In Quebec you could [in the past] expect a film or two making more than C$1.5 million [US$1 million] in a year. Last year we had only one film—'Liste Noire'—making one million dollars [US$700,000], and the other ones made C$300,000 to C$400,000 [US$210,000-276,000]. I remember five or six years ago we could expect very easily C$200,000 [US$138,000] from a Quebec film. Now some films are making less than that. The boxoffice has decreased for Quebec film an average of 20 to 25 percent."

According to Alex Films, a Quebec company that provides financial information on cinema to subscribers, 86 percent of French language boxoffice went to U.S. product in 1995.

"There is a widening gap between established filmmakers like Atom Egoyan and David Cronenberg, who will continue to make their films and will be financed, and young first-time filmmakers, who have no real place to go in the same way that they used to."

One culprit, says Macerola, is the 10-year-old Bill 109, under which American films must be made available in a dubbed French version within a month of the original English language release, thus grabbing both language groups right off the bat. Ironically, that law was passed with the intention of bolstering French-language cinema.

Macerola would like to see the Canadian public support Canadian film in greater numbers and get used to the idea of local films being a regular part of their film-going diet. "[The films you choose to see] could very well be Canadian if you're challenged on the screen by many Canadian films. But the problem is you have three, four Canadian films launched in September, the same number in February, and that's the end of it. You then have to wait another year in order to be challenged by Canadian films."

There are bright spots in Canadian film production, including British Columbia, which has weathered cutbacks and just recently placed three films into the Toronto International Film Festival, including Bruce McDonald's highly touted "Hard Core Logo" and the "necrophilia comedy" "Kiss." And some Canadian films, such as "Margaret's Museum" and Robert Lepage's "Le Confessional," have performed very well at the boxoffice. Optimism therefore exists, but it's tempered.

"I do not believe there will be a fading away of the talent that's been developed in the last decade," says Raffe. However, adds Handling, "It's a very fragile, uncertain time right now. The next year and the year after is when we'll really begin to see what impact the cuts have had."

A MOVABLE FEST

The Ontario Northern and Southern Film Circuits Bring Art-House Programs to Canadian Communities

by Shlomo Schwartzberg
BOXOFFICE Canadian Correspondent

For art-house fans in many of Ontario's smaller communities, it used to be fest or famine. If they wanted to see specialty fare on the bigscreen, they'd have to trek across the province to seek out a film festival. Now, the festivals can come to them, thanks to the Ontario Northern and Southern Film Circuits, which bring art and foreign language films to communities that would otherwise never see them. The program's genesis began in 1989 with the launch of Cinefest, the Sudbury Film Festival, whose success revealed a previously untapped market for niche product.

Cam Haynes, a local concert promoter, was the man chosen to help launch an international film festival in the Northern Ontario town. "I was approached about putting it together. I had no idea about a film festival, how big it could be, how little it could be." Eventually, Haynes got government funding, and on a C$250,000 (US$172,500) budget, the first year was off and running, with 24 films unveiled over three days. "The very first year, we had 9,000 people—I thought we'd have 3,000. It took off instantaneously." Nine years later, the 1996 edition of Cinefest featured 100 films and 25,000 people attended. "It would double every year," says Haynes. "The entire North would come to the festival and they would start saying, 'We'd like to see these films in our city.'" That's how Haynes began the Northern Film Circuit in 1992, an extension of Cinefest in which select foreign language, art and Canadian films are brought to towns that usually only receive Hollywood movies.

The Circuits are not a chain, but rather a loose affiliation of otherwise independent screens that show specialized product. Eleven cities have signed on to be a part of the Northern Circuit, while the Southern Circuit currently has 23 cities aboard. The Circuit program is a cooperative venture between local exhibitors, distributors and groups in each community who set up the screenings, with all three partners sharing equally in the boxoffice. Communities can elect to show movies on any basis they choose, from every week to once a month (the norm) to periodic mini-film festivals of three or four films over as many days. All of this is facilitated by The Toronto International Film Festival Group, which operates purely altruistically in order to get the word out on the types of films the Circuits (and the Toronto festival itself) show. "The general idea behind the Circuits is to [raise the films' profiles] to the point where they reach the capacity of potential in their community," says Haynes.

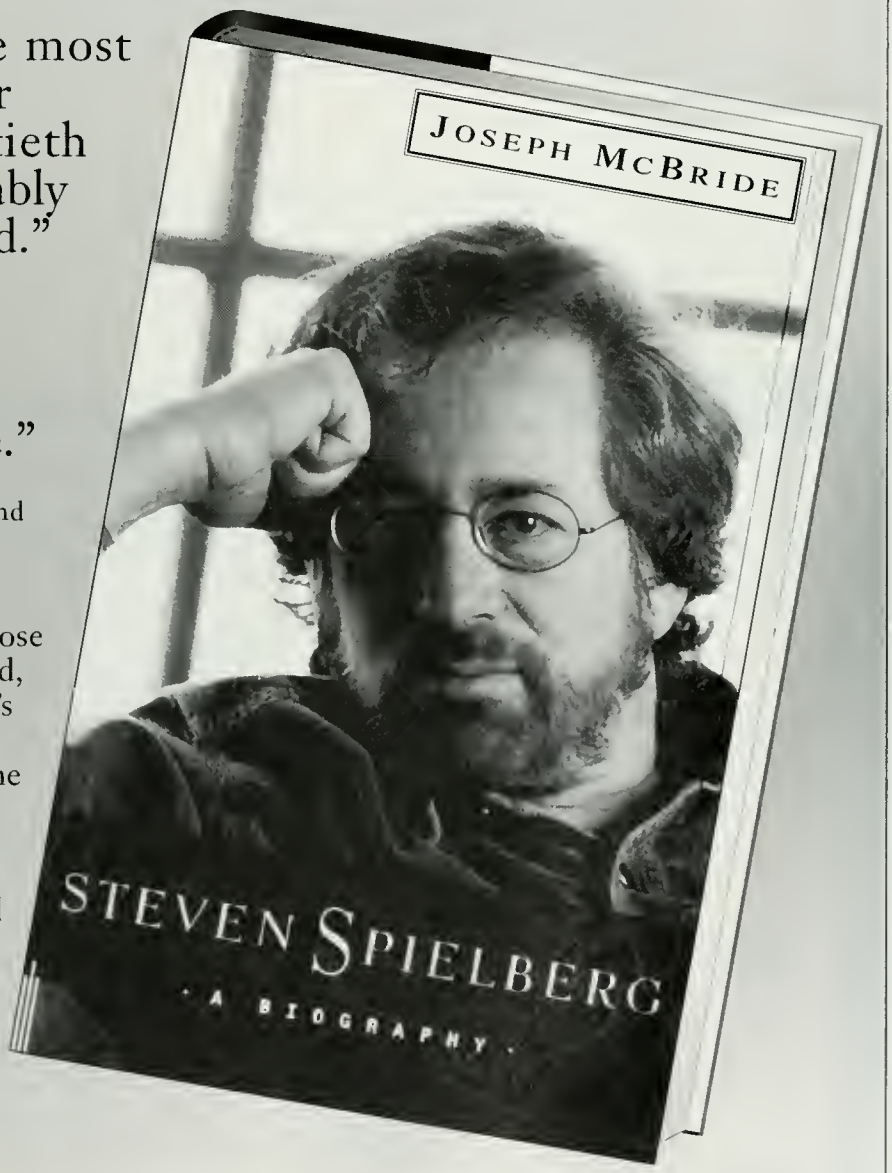
The Ontario Northern and Southern Film Circuit program brings art-house films like "Margaret's Museum" to communities where they might not otherwise have played.

It's been an educational experience for Haynes on several levels. "I didn't know, quite frankly, [how the Circuits would do]. The reality is that everybody said it would go over like a lead balloon. The attitude out of Montreal and Toronto was a slight feeling of 'How could [art films] go over in Sudbury?' They sit back and wonder, 'Is this going to work?', and suddenly 200 people show up for 'Margaret's Museum' [despite the fact that] it's already on video."

Economically, the Circuits are quite profitable, and have been since the beginning. "The numbers started to get pretty significant. [One Circuit screen would do] as much business in one night as the five-plex would be doing at the same time. In Thunder Bay, which has 17 screens, my guesstimate is that [one of our films] would do more business in one night than the entire [other] 16 screens would be doing."

Haynes estimates that the year-long take in 1996 for the Circuits was a healthy $C275,000 (US$190,000), more than double the 1995 total, when the Northern Film Circuit and the newly-formed Southern Film Circuit (which started in September of that year) together took in C$132,000 (US$92,000). The Southern Film Circuit is the more popular of the two: in its first calendar year, it made C$125,000 (US$91,075).

"The South is easier to do," says Haynes. "It's closer to the media base [in Toronto], closer to the action, it has more universities and colleges."



But both Circuits are prospering, thanks in large part to community involvement in raising interest. "We started to find out recently that we can do more business in one night with a film than [a competing theatre] will do [with the same film] in an entire week. It's happened a few times when the commercial exhibitor ran a film for a week, and we picked it up three weeks later, ran it one night and did more business in the 7 p.m. screening [than the competing exhibitor did for the entire run]." Haynes attributes that to several factors. "It's the community grass roots. The community picks the film, they go out and promote it, they hustle it, they put more action in that film screening than anyone can. Even Disney, when it comes down to it, they can't hit a town that hard. When you hustle things at a local level, they've got their own mailing lists they go directly to, the money goes back into the community—there are so many things that go into this that the distributors cannot do."

Haynes doesn't feel showing extended or open-ended runs of such films as "Breaking The Waves," "Secrets & Lies" or "Big Night" is a good idea. "You run a film for a week, you're going to start losing people every single night. We've already found that we can get, say, 400 people in one night, where [over the whole week] we [only get] 500 people."

Prices that the Circuits charge vary, depending which night the film is slotted for. Tickets on Tuesdays, the traditional cheap Canadian movie night, might be C$4.25 (US$3), or a full Canadian movie price of C$8.50 (US$5.90) may be charged. "The average is C$6.50 (US$ 4.50), says Haynes. "That's pretty close to the same prices as commercial films."

Interestingly enough, despite such controversial films as "Trainspotting" and "Priest" on the Circuits, complaints from some communities perceived as bedrocks of conservatism are quite rare. "When they were running 'Priest' in Toronto, [people] were boycotting it. [But] this thing went quietly through all these small cities, all those places where you would never expect the film to run.

"We work with the communities," says Haynes. "We suggested 'Trainspotting' and 'Hard Core Logo' [a "Spinal Tap"-like mockumentary about a fictional punk band] to spread out into a younger market. The average audience [at the Circuits' programs] is 35-years-plus, upper-scale and highly educated."

Haynes does attach one criterion to the films the communities show through the Circuits. "There is one thing we ask them to do, and that's to play as many Canadian films as they possibly can and they're willing to." It hasn't been a bad decision for them. "'Margaret's Museum' [a Canadian-British co-production, set in Glace Bay, Nova Scotia] did more business than any other film ever did." That movie averaged C$1,200 (US$830) per screening, for a total of C$40,000 (US$28,000) in 35 screenings. "C$1,000 (US$700) a night is what we gun for," says Haynes.

"Everybody said it would go over like a lead balloon. The attitude was, 'How could [art films] go over in Sudbury?' They wonder, 'Is this going to work?', and suddenly 200 people show up for 'Margaret's Museum' [despite the fact that] it's already on video."

The popularity of those Canadian films is directly traceable to the media push of local product in Toronto, he feels. "There's so much promotion that comes out for Canadian film, they're written about in the national papers."

In general, Haynes figures that perhaps 25 percent of all Circuit films (and more than 210 have been shown to date) make the optimum C$1,000 (US $700) per screen goal, and 50-60 percent are considered financially successful. Haynes points out that "since 1992, we've never lost a city [off the Circuit] due to financial considerations. We have lost cities because the theatre closed down or because the projectionist died, but we've never lost a city [otherwise]."

The expansion of the Circuits is growing rapidly. Haynes still has numerous communities that he wants to sign up, and many of them will be climbing aboard in 1997 and 1998. There have even been inquiries from other Canadian provinces, including Saskatchewan, Quebec, Alberta and British Columbia.

The Circuits are simply an affordable entertainment alternative, says Haynes "There's nothing a town can do for $500. You can't bring in Bruce Springsteen or Nana Mouskouri. [But] you can bring in the biggest Greek film of all time for $500."

The Circuits are a benefit for everyone, says Haynes. "That's what's so neat. The [patrons get what they want], exhibitors get people back in the theatre and the distributor gets the market. Everyone wins."

THE HOUSE THAT KEITH BUILT

Keith Stata Turned His Kinmount, Ontario Home Into a Cinema And Museum Complex

By Susan Lambert

MARQUEE DE CINEMA: Keith Stata shows off the Highlands cinema road sign that directs tourists to his house where a five-screen, 550-seat theatre filled with cinema antiques awaits them.

A visit to the Highlands Theatre in Kinmount, Ontario can be a lot like dropping in on your neighbor. Because this five-screen, 550-seat cinema (which can seat 250 more patrons than there are residents in Kinmount) with its 4,000-square-foot lobby is built into Keith Stata's house. And from the front, the house is all you can see. "It's an optical illusion," explains Keith with a grin. "The theatre is part of the house. It's all joined. The house actually runs over the top of the first theatre."

Keith says the facade catches visitors by surprise. "You'll hear them outside and the kid will be saying, 'Mother, this is somebody's house.' And then they get inside and they go and go. So it's really kind of fun—the novelty of it."

Keith was involved in exhibition right from the start. At the tender of age of six, he was showing movies in the woodshed for two cents a pop. Keith made several super-8 films in high school which culminated in a hour-long sci-fi extravaganza he and friends raised thousands of dollars to make. But Keith had little desire to head to the States to pursue an iffy career in filmmaking. The Vietnam War was on and, adds Keith, "I'm a small-town person."

So Keith pursued a more practical line of work in construction. In 1975, when he began building his house, Keith as a matter of course made plans to include a small 50 seat 16mm theatre. It was an exhibitor variation on the famous "Field of Dreams" adage that "if you build it, they will come." The mortgage company wasn't as visionary. "They basically said, you can play around with this if you want, but the building cannot look like a theatre. It's got to look like a house." So the house had a rec room with 18-foot ceilings, step flooring, stadium seating and a screen in front of the patio doors.

Keith opened the theatre in 1979. "Basically at first," Keith admits, "it didn't do that well." But he switched to 35mm in 1984 and people started coming. By early 1986 the theatre had grown to 73 seats and Keith added a second screen to seat 60. And more people came. Keith started his museum of historical cinema equipment. Still more people came. And then some. "I think our attendance doubled every year from then on," explains Keith. "We were sort of scrambling to keep up. In 1988, we added a third theatre." But even that wasn't enough. So Keith expanded the second theatre to 152 seats, figuring it would never sell out. It did just that on the second night. Now at five screens, Keith thinks he may finally have caught up for the moment. "I think we're at the point right now where it would be silly to add any more. Besides which, we're running out of property."

Keith says keeping up with his audience—many of whom come from as far away as Toronto—is vital. In the summer, the population in a 30-mile radius blossoms to 30,000. "Although a good proportion of our audience is local, we need the tourists, we need the huge numbers of them to make it work. If you have people driving 50 miles to come to a show, they don't want to wait 45 minutes to get to the door to find out they can't get in. We'd thought we would never get a lot of profit out of it, but we didn't want to destroy what we had built up." The Highlands now far surpasses what the construction business was ever bringing in, and Keith proudly says all the profits go back into the theatre. "We're always upgrading."

The Highlands Cinema shows first-run movies seven days a week in the summer (May through August) and then weekends until October, when it closes until the following spring—because, when the tourists go, so does his business. But in that five month season, Keith estimates around 40,000 people will visit the Highlands cinema.

With those kinds of crowds, Keith and his manager/partner, Roland Hamilton, are not above last-minute changes to keep things running smoothly when one of the small theatres is overselling and the big theatre isn't. "We play musical theatres. Our audience thinks it's fun. You never know where you're going to wind up when you come here." In order to keep the crowds thinned, Keith staggers the showtimes really wide. "Now you can come in when we're sold out and not think we're busy."

That also gives his customers a chance to browse in the museum/lobby before the show, examining the largest collection of cinema artifacts in Canada. The museum is Keith's pride and joy, and he scours North America for more equipment and theatre parts. Each of the theatres is outfitted with pieces from old cinema houses in Canada and the United States. Keith says, "Part of what the theatre is all about is detail. There is a lot to do, lots to touch, things you wouldn't normally see. We throw so much stuff in that you have to come back at least six times to see everything, and even then you may not." When Keith hears of an old moviehouse closing, he'll see if he can save a piece of it. "I [stripped] a theatre last week and got a really nice gold drape out of it, which we're going to use in one of the theatres."

Keith's collection includes over 450 projectors and 4,000 posters and lobby cards. Although he's reluctant to name a favorite item, Keith is extremely proud of his 1921 Motiograph F projector. "It came from the Palace Theatre in Blind River. We were doing the roof on number two in '86 and I phoned up that theatre to see what they had there. He said, 'Well, I'm not sure, but the lamphouse has a name stenciled on it. I think it says Motiograph and it says "F" or something.' I got down off the roof, put the lids on the tar cans, drove right to Blind River—about nine hours away—and picked it up."

Keith says his customers love the atmosphere the living museum provides. "Let's put it this way: We have no plastic seats; we have no ceiling tile; we have no soundfold. The theatres all have character and there is an ambiance to the place that is really warm and welcoming." And Keith is particular about the upkeep. "We're very picky. Our bathroom floors are scrubbed and waxed every week. The carpets are shampooed every spring. The theatres themselves are extremely comfortable. We paint our floors every year and, because we're only open five months, that means we paint our floors every five months."

In return, he's just as demanding of his audience. Keith explains, "A thing that we insist on here and that we're paranoid about is silence in the theatres. We do not permit our customers to talk. The price of the ticket does not permit you to go in there and annoy other people. It is a rule." Keith says he gets standing ovations when he takes out people who are talking. He adds that many theatre owners don't realize only a few customers will actually complain about distractions and problems with sound or picture. "Most just don't come back. I disagree with that. I think the customer should have some responsibility to report a problem because things can happen and you can't be everywhere at once. But I've run into this attitude of 'Why should I? It's not my job. I just don't come back.' So I think you really need to be on your toes."

The biggest changes Keith has seen in the movie business since he started are both good and bad. He thinks the high percentages the film companies get are becoming ridiculous, but improvements in sound technology are, by and large, very good. He is particularly saddened to witness the closure of so many old-fashioned movie palaces. "There seems to be a loss of grandeur. It's unfortunate that there's not a lot of respect for history." The Highlands cinema, in contrast, revels in history and celebrates a respect for the moviegoing experience that's unsurpassed. Keith says passionately, "Somebody should care. You can have all the latest digital technology. You can have the finest screen. The finest sound system. The finest projector. But, if the darn thing is out of focus or out of frame and you've got people running it that don't know what they're doing, how good is the presentation?"

Keith says the joy of his job is the satisfaction he gets from people who truly enjoy the theatre. "There is a suggestion box and we get a lot of nice comments from people saying how much they enjoy the place. [Actor] Rick Moranis was here one night and left us a nice little note." On his security camera tapes Keith heard a woman exclaim, "Now I see why you come here all the time. This place is great." Keith adds, "It's that kind of thing that makes it well worthwhile."

By the time the summer is over, Keith says he's over, exhausted by the 16 and sometimes 20-hour days. "Nobody ever thought it would succeed, including me. It was never intended to get as big as it has. It just sort of went, and we sort of followed." Or more precisely, he built it and they came.

THE FIFTH ELEMENT

Vancouver Art-House Patrons See It Coming Around Fifth Avenue by Shlomo Schwartzberg

With the recent opening of Vancouver's five-screen Fifth Avenue Cinemas, the city has almost overnight become a major venue for art and foreign language films. And the theatre's a success in its own right. "We've been doing very, very well. We've had over 200,000 filmgoers since we opened [last June 14]," says Leonard Schein, a longtime film programmer and exhibitor, who runs the Fifth Avenue complex, along with two other single-screen houses in the city (the Ridge and the Vancouver East). "We're fulfilling a need for people who haven't been coming to see the other [more commercial] films in the area."

Though it's one of Canada's top three markets for art-house product, Vancouver has never been as privileged as Montreal and Toronto, both of which have long had houses devoted to films of the off-the-beaten-path genre. "It was hard getting screens. Vancouver was underscreened for the non-major Hollywood films," says Schein.

"A lot of times, theatres go after the more commercial films, but hopefully, if Fifth Avenue is successful, somebody else will build other multiplexes dedicated to more art films, [which will in turn boost the market even further]."

In many ways, Fifth Avenue Cinemas has come along at a good time for the types of films it specializes in exhibiting, says Schein. "I think for good, quality films, [the market is] certainly on an upswing," he observes, noting that Canada's two major circuits, Famous Players and Cineplex, are showing more art-house fare lately (though of course, as Canada's major mainstream players, their predominant focus remains commercial product.)

"[Art-house films] are certainly being produced a lot more and distributed," he adds. "Right now in Canada, there's a shortage of good quality theatres to show them. A lot of times, theatres go after the more commercial films, but hopefully, if Fifth Avenue is successful, then Cineplex or Famous or somebody else will build other multiplexes dedicated to more specialized films, upscale films, art films, whatever you want to label them, [which will in turn boost the market even further]."

Schein, who has been in the business since 1978, cites a few reasons why Vancouver is a particularly good locale in which to operate an art-house. "Sometimes, we actually do [open] a film here before Toronto. Canada doesn't have a lot of markets and Toronto is a much more expensive city to open a film in than Vancouver. I think sometimes distributors experiment a bit more in Vancouver and see how it goes."

Vancouver, like most Canadian cities, does tend to suffer when a film fails in Toronto first, says Schein. "When a distributor decides to market a campaign, he's looking at one budget, a national budget, and if the film doesn't do well in Toronto, he'll cut the Vancouver budget, even though the film might be doing well in Vancouver. He only has to look at his bottom line for the whole country." Yet such films as "Jane Eyre" and "Lone Star" were bigger hits out West than in Toronto, Schein points out.

To get the word out on specific films, his cinema does benefits for various groups and charities and advertises foreign language films in the ethnic press. Schein will also do tie-ins for specific films with appropriate stores near his cinema.

Among the films that have done very well at Fifth Avenue are "Welcome to the Dollhouse," "Shine," "Emma," "Trainspotting," "Lone Star" and "Secrets and Lies." "'Shine' made C$200,000 (US$138,000) from its Dec. 25 opening through the end of February," says Schein. "'Secrets and Lies' made C$125,000 (US$86,250) in 11 weeks. 'Lone Star' did C$175,000 (US$120,750) in 15 weeks—three times the business of downtown—and 'Trainspotting' [did] C$175,000 (US$120,750) in 12 weeks. 'Welcome to the Dollhouse' did better here [than anywhere else] in Canada." Occasionally, Fifth Avenue has shown more commercial films, such as "The Fan" and "Alaska," "which have not done as well" there. "We have five screens and not all the time are there enough [art-house] films. Sometimes there is only one print for Canada, and we have to wait for Toronto."

One reason for Fifth Avenue's success, Schein believes, is the state-of-the-art equipment he had installed in his new theatre. "We're newer, we've designed bigger theatres, better sound. We have digital sound, brand new seats. We have cappuccino, a full-service concession stand, baked goods, handmade lattes, and a beautiful mural of Vancouver in the lobby. When you enter [the theatre], it's all on one floor, two theatres to the left of the concession stand, three on the right. The big theatre has a balcony, it's one of the few recent theatres built with one. The theatres [which range from 100-350 seats] are wheelchair accessible. There's free underground parking, with your ticket. You can take the elevator from there to the boxoffice.

"Fifth Avenue has nice big screens that are two full stories," Schein continues. "They don't feel like small theatres. The cinemas were designed by David Mesbur, who designed the Pantages theatre in Toronto and the Canada Square cinema in Toronto. He also designed the Universal City complex. [The auditoriums] were designed by an architect who knows acoustics inside out. The digital sound is incredible. I'm pleased by how perfect the sound is." Schein is also proud of Fifth Avenue's "airy, light" look and the unique concession booths which are seemingly on water with a mock bridge, made of neon and plywood, which is meant to simulate the nearby Burrard St. Bridge.

Patrons of Fifth Avenue have the option of taking out memberships for C$12 (US$8.28) a year, which enables them to gain discounted admission to any of Schein's three houses. With that membership, they can bring their ticket price down to C$6.50 (US$4.49) from C$8.50 (US$5.87), or on lower priced Tuesdays from C$6.50 (US$4.49) down to $5 (US$3.45); weekend matinees down a dollar to C$5 (US$3.45) and weekday matinees down a dollar to C$4 (US$2.76). The 15,000 members can also use their cards to upgrade from a small to medium popcorn or coffee for the same price.

The Fifth Avenue's lobby features a mural of downtown Vancouver.

Fifth Avenue can also boast "a very friendly staff," says Schein. (Forty-four people, mostly part time staff, work at Fifth Avenue).

Informal surveys have determined that Fifth Avenue's patrons tend to be 40 years and older. "There are very few teenagers here [because] of the type of films we show," says Schein.

Schein has seen an upsurge of business in the surrounding neighborhood since Fifth Avenue joined the West Side of the city. "The area has certainly changed. More development signs are going up, more businesses [forming]. Fifth Avenue is quite a big draw—we get 8,000 people per week."

Now that Fifth Avenue is almost a year old and going strong, the 48-year-old Schein, who started the Vancouver International Film Festival in 1982 and ran it for five years and who also helmed the Toronto International Film Festival for one year, can bask in his newest success and its drawing power.

It's a distinct change from the way things used to be in his long career as an exhibitor. "I was always calling trying to get films," says Schein. "[Now we have access to] more films that we can play. It's nice."

BLISS ★★★★

Starring Craig Sheffer, Sheryl Lee and Terence Stamp. Directed and written by Lance Young. Produced by Allyn Stewart. A Triumph release. Drama. Rated NC-17 for sex (rating being appealed). Running time: 102 min. Opens 5/16.

A film about sexuality and personality that will likely prove better than its audience, "Bliss" tells of the domestic dissolution and redemption of a young husband, architect Joseph ("Sleep With Me's" Craig Sheffer), and his troubled wife Maria ("Mother Night's" Sheryl Lee). "Bliss" opens on the day of their wedding, with both partners shown bringing different takes of uncertainty to the ceremony; six months later, the two are already in therapy, with Maria admitting to their psychiatrist ("Gray's Anatomy's" Spalding Gray) and her shocked husband that she fakes her orgasms. In her desperation for happiness, she clandestinely engages an unconventional sex therapist, Baltazar (Terence Stamp), for counseling. When Joseph discavers her liaisons, he first confronts Baltazar but soon finds himself being schooled in the secrets of eros—and in his wife's inner turmoils, as her long-hidden childhood trauma surfaces.

Sheryl Lee and Craig Sheffer star in Triumph's "Bliss."

Nothing in writer/director Lance Young's bio—USC golf scholarship student, Gulf + Western financial analyst, production executive at Paramount ("Black Rain") and Warner ("Dennis the Menace")—would lead audiences to expect the depth of psychology and emotion on display in "Bliss." Despite a hefty amount of nudity and carnality (thus the tentative rating), there is nothing exploitive in the film; if it's anything, "Bliss" is earnest to a fault. Contemporary moviegoers accustomed to seeing sex scenes inserted primarily for glamor are likely to be snickeringly uncomfortable with the honest item; even if they sink into the film's intimate spell, references to chakras and other Tantric lingo—despite, or perhaps because of, the film's almost scholarly nature—could set them giggling again.

But "Bliss" is hardly a chapter out of the Kama Sutra; if "Bliss" has a lesson to preach, it's to be found in its humanity. As the loving husband, Sheffer is marvelous in capturing his character's devotion for Maria; Joseph's unyielding sincerity is the film's keel. As Maria, Lee is shaky in the early, easy going but, as the film progresses and her character's private demon begins to surface, Lee is splendid at capturing her character's shattering and salvation. As Boltazar, a minefield of a character for an actor, Stamp never teeters; his august solemnity is the film's anchar. Whether "Bliss" will find a safe harbor stateside is another question.—Kim Williamson

ROUGH MAGIC ★★

Starring Bridget Fonda and Russell Crowe. Directed by Clare Peploe. Written by Robert Mundy and William Brookfield & Clare Peploe. Produced by Laurie Parker and Declan Baldwin. A Goldwyn release. Fantasy. Not yet rated. Running time: 105 min. Opens 5/30.

Adapted from the James Hadley novel "Miss Shumway Waves a Wand," this UGC production about a young magician's assistant (Bridget Fonda) who loses her heart and her powers on a journey through Mexico only to have them restored in the end by faith in the itinerant journalist (Russell Crowe) who loves her is an uneasy mix of genres. Elements of film noir, romantic adventure and magical realism collide, undercutting the eager efforts of the players.

As crafted by Clare Peploe ("High Season"), wife of Bernardo Bertolucci, this Rysher acquisition has moments of otherworldly earthiness but in more diluted content than her husband's work. Characterization, though intriguing, wanders; happenstance too often rules a charmingly unusual narrative; a promising subplot involving the search for a magic Mayan elixir by an Englishman (Jim Broadbent) fails to lend depth; and the magic that'd be believable on the page seems impossible on the all-too-literal big screen.—Kim Williamson

Starring James Duval, Rachel True and Nathan Bexton. Directed and written by Gregg Araki. Produced by Gregg Araki and Andrea Sperling. A Fine Line release. Comedy/drama. Rated R for scenes of strong violence, sexuality and drug use involving teens, and for strong language. Running time: 82 min. Opens 5/9.

The final installment of Gregg Araki's "teen apocalypse" trilogy (following "Totally Fed Up" and "The Doom Generation"), "nowhere" wants to have it both ways, satirizing the affectless, brain-dead anomie of his characters while at the same time reveling in their nihilistic hedonism. A movie that makes "Less Than Zero" seem quaint and square (how quickly times change), "nowhere" no doubt also will seem ridiculously dated in the near future, if it doesn't already.

Araki's once-minimal budgets have risen to give this film a glossy metallic surface, with emptily pretty Los Angeles Gen-Xers striking self-conscious poses against stylized backgrounds. The chic visual tone, which ironically glorifies consumerism, is comically juxtaposed with the characters' constant stream of gutter vulgarity. All they talk about are bodily functions and how to satisfy their immediate physical urges.

But the sex on display is joyless, even deadly. There's little plot (plot demands reason); "nowhere" is mostly a series of absurdist incidents interspersed with escalating incidents of stomach-churning violence and encounters with a cheesy-looking alien who seems to have wandered in from the set of an old Roger Corman movie. That device is oddly appropriate, for the people here behave like characters from a sci-fi flick.

The only ones with recognizable human emotions are a sweet ingenue (Sarah Lassez) who gets horribly brutalized and James Duval's Dark, Araki's disaffected protagonist. Dark sadly calls himself "old-fashioned" because he wants to be monogamous with his bisexual, I'll-try-anything girlfriend ("The Craft's" Rachel True). Underneath Araki's hedonistic skin there beats the heart of a Puritanical moralist, maybe even a latent straight. But the conflicts on display here are too flippantly rendered to be affecting.—Joseph McBride

Starring Anthony LaPaglia and Gia Carides. Directed and written by Ben Lewin. Produced by Bob Weis. A Goldwyn release. Romantic comedy. Rated R for sexuality and related dialogue. Running time: 99 min. Opens 5/9.

In this romantic comedy (aka "Lucky Break"), a writer of erotica ("Two If By Sea's" Gia Carides) lets her tales take her where she thinks her crippled leg would never allow her. When she breaks that leg, however, she has the perfect "disguise." Now uninhibited, she goes after the man of her dreams—a handsome but engaged jeweler ("Trees Lounge's" Anthony LaPaglia). Comic catastrophe follows, though not in ways fans of romantic comedy might wish.

As in "Strictly Ballroom," Carides is winning onscreen, but the romance of the tale is limited by her lover's drawbacks; not only does he break hearts, he's a crook. Still, LaPaglia makes his callow crook a modestly charismatic one, meaning audiences can vote, if not root, for their ultimate union. Director/writer Ben Lewin keeps the narrative bouncing along, if sometimes too bumpily to allow the movie's resident humor free rein.—Kim Williamson

FLASHBACK: AUGUST 1, 1966
What BOXOFFICE said about...

BATMAN

[In the mid-'60s, when the "Batman" series ruled the airwaves (two episodes per week), Fox decided to take the camp classic to the big screen. Now Warner Bros. has a less campy Caped Crusader returning for a fourth live-action rendition since 1989's relaunching. Here's what BOXOFFICE, using an avalanche of adjectives, thought of the cliffhanger/comedy three decades ago.]

The incredible, incomparable adventures of that intrepid, invicible hero—Batman—and his inseparable, ingratiating aide-de-"camp"—Robin—while combating incorrigible, incurable criminals who concoct ingenious, infamous acts upon indefensible society, made such an instantaneous, indelible impression on innumerable, insatiable millions last January that Batmania has become a biweekly, intriguing, indispensable part of home entertainment. With such a pre-sold audience to draw on, it was inevitable that "Batman" should make his larger-than-life debut in DeLuxe Color. Instead of a single villain to grapple with, there are four, and the prop department at Fox has supplemented Batman's anti-crime arsenal with new Bat gadgets to combat their skulduggery, including a Batboat with a surface speed of a raging 90 knots, and special effects man L.B. Abbott creates some eye-popping illusions for the William Dozier production. Lorenzo Semple Jr., who developed the original video format for "Batman," includes all key characters from the TV series, and the same tongue-in-cheek approach to Batman's preposterous exploits is maintained by director Leslie H. Martinson. The film should make a mint for everybody. Starring Adam West, Burt Ward, Lee Meriwether, Cesar Romero, Burgess Meredith and Frank Gorshin.

LETTERS OF LOVE ★★★★

Starring Miho Nakayama, Etsushi Toyokaya and Katsuyuki Shinohara. Directed and written by Shunji Iwai. Produced by Jiro Komaki, Tomoki Ikeda and Mashiiko Nagasawa. A Fine Line release. Drama. Japanese-language; subtitled. Not yet rated. Running time: 117 min. Screened at the 1995 Toronto fest. Opens 5/2 NY, 5/23 L.A.

This lovely and delicate feature debut (aka "Love Letter") of video and TV director Shunji Iwai displays a sophistication and control that many more experienced filmmakers have yet to display. It immediately propels Iwai to the front ranks of the new Japanese directors.

Hiroko Watanabe (Miho Nakayama) is a meek girl still mourning her fiance, Itsuki Fujii, who died two years earlier. On a whim, she writes him at his old address. Hiroko still receives a reply, from an Itsuki Fujii, a female classmate of the other Itsuki. She's a woman who shared his name and, as is gradually revealed, much more.

On the surface, the film evokes the British drama "84 Charing Cross Road," with two people corresponding but never meeting. But "Love Letter" goes beyond moving drama to deeper concerns of memory, love, loss and an indefinable mystery of two women fated to connect through strange coincidence.—Schlomo Schwartzberg

THE DESIGNATED MOURNER ★★1/2

Starring Mike Nichols, Miranda Richardson and David de Keyser. Directed by David Hare. Written by Wallace Shawn. Produced by Donna Grey and David Hare. A First Look release. Drama. Rated R for some language. Running time: 94 min. Screened at the Berlin fest. Opens 5/2 NY.

Mike Nichols is a wonderful actor. Of the three who perform this spare cinematic version—a reading, really, of Wallace Shawn's play—Nichols, the eminent director, is the one who takes the starch out of the words, reeling off Shawn's literate, elegant phrases as if he's just come up with them himself. He plays Jack, a "failed" writer. Miranda Richardson ("The Evening Star") is his wife, Judy, the daughter of Howard (David de Keyser), an intellectual. Jack is also the title's designated mourner, mourning the death of highbrow culture.

The starkness of director David Hare's presentation, three actors sitting at a table, seems to taunt viewers with making the same distinction about themselves: Can they watch such a movie and find it stimulating without the requisite explosions, quick editing cuts, even costume changes to provide visual interest? The answer is no. In the transfer from stage to screen, the electricity of live performances is lost, while the confining set and lengthy close-ups are claustrophobic.—Melissa Morrison

TRUTH OR CONSEQUENCES, N.M. ★★

Starring Kiefer Sutherland, Vincent Gallo and Kim Dickens. Directed by Kiefer Sutherland. Written by Brad Mirman. Produced by J. Paul Higgins, Kevin Messick and Hilary Wayne. A Triumph release. Thriller. Rated R for a substantial amount of strong violence, and for sex, language and drug use. Running time: 102 min. Opens 5/2.

A passable pulp thriller, "Truth or Consequences, N.M." sustains a brisk story momentum for about an hour before collapsing into disheveled events and contrived coincidences. Directing his second feature, Kiefer Sutherland overcomes script faults with a sleek stylistic sheen and rapid pacing.

In perhaps his most fully realized and dimensional character to date, Vincent Gallo as a crook on the run turns a typical loser part into a sympathetic antihero, and Kim Dickens as his moll supports him with an equally strong and rounded portrayal. Gleefully playing another reprehensible lunatic, Sutherland conveys a bit more human edge to his villainy than usual. Capable work is turned in by the rest of the cast, who avoid stereotypes wherever possible. The hardboiled and tough-talking qualities in Brad Mirman's writing are assets, but he gets wrapped up in formula plot hokum and not enough in developing characters and relationship conflicts.—Dale Winogura

CHILDREN OF THE REVOLUTION ★★★

Starring Judy Davis, Sam Neill, F. Murray Abraham, Richard Roxburgh and Geoffrey Rush. Directed and written by Peter Duncan. Produced by Tristram Miall. A Miramax release. Comedy/drama. Rated R for some strong sexuality and language. Running time: 100 min. Opens 5/1.

Judy Davis—young and old, funny and sad, witty and humorless—is at her entertaining best as a lifelong relentless revolutionary. This Australian film, whose superb cast also includes a sparky Sam Neill and a charmingly soft Geoffrey Rush ("Shine"), is a fanciful black comedy about Joseph Stalin's legacy, figuratively and literally.

Davis as Joan Fraser, ardent communist and, by an oddball set of circumstances, bearer of "Uncle Joe's" child, hopes to make the son the equal of the sire. Blind as she was to Stalin's faults, it's no surprise that the boy doesn't turn out the way she wants. But the film contains lots of surprises, both humorous and touching, as it speaks of the worth of passionate belief and the dangers of blinkered devotion. Amid the stylized crazy humor and complex jokes of real farce the actors create honest feelings.

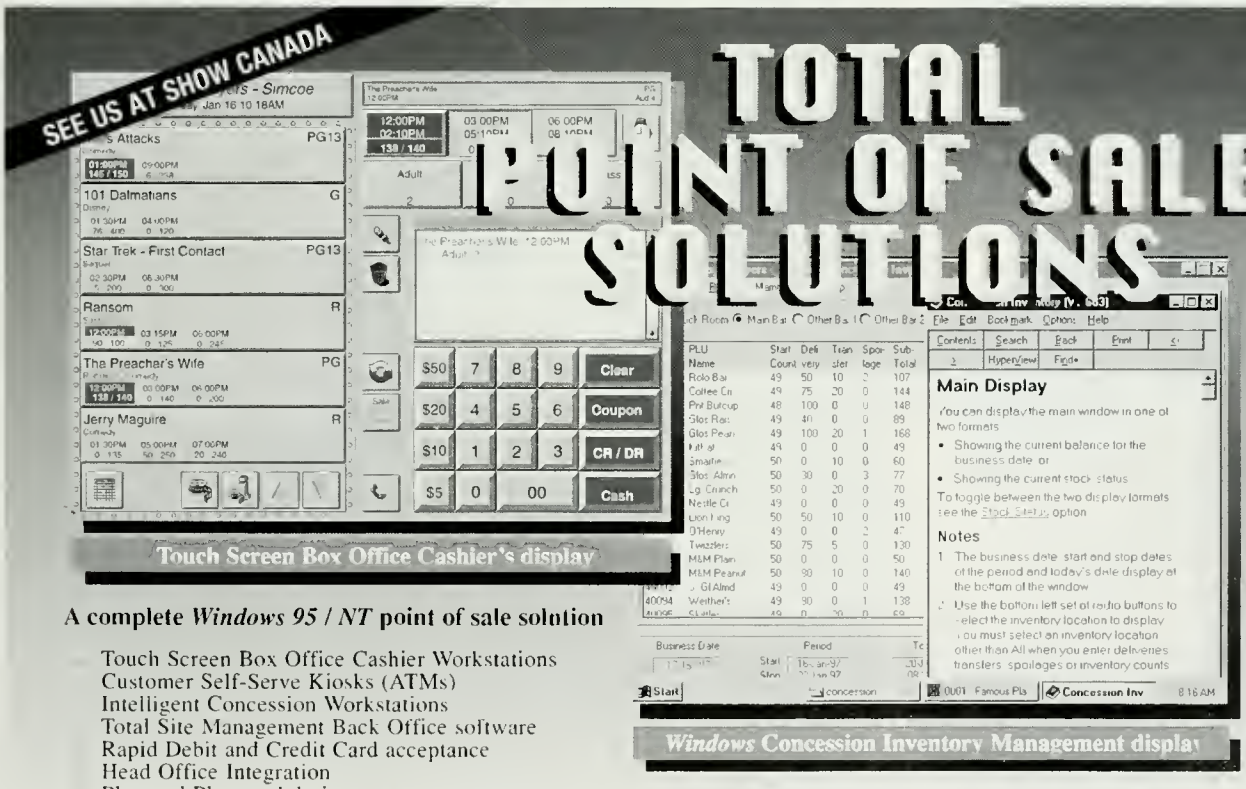
Lively and sure-footed, Peter Duncan's writing and directing take delight with pitfalls and pratfalls, though the film loses momentum eventually.—Bridget Byrne

PARADISE ROAD ★★

Starring Glenn Close and Pauline Collins. Directed and written by Bruce Beresford. Produced by Sue Milliken and Greg Coote. A Fox Searchlight release. Drama. Rated R for prisoner-of-war brutality and violence. Running time: 110 min. Opens 4/25.

In a Japanese war camp in Sumatra, women prisoners form a vocal orchestra to defy the brutality and hopelessness of their surroundings. Unfortunately, writer/director Bruce Beresford ("Last Dance") fails to make this true story sing on its own merits; "Paradise Road" unfolds as little more than a TV movie with extra violence and a quality cast.

Glenn Close plays Adrienne, who joins with former missionary Margaret ("City of Joy's" Pauline Collins) to organize the effort. Reeking of self-importance, Close seems on an ego-trip disguised as a performance; Collins, on the other hand, inhabits her spiritual Margaret so well that, when she says she can't hate their tormentors, she's not only believable but heroic. Australian Cate Blanchett makes a promising feature debut as young nurse Susan Macarthy, who befriends a German, Dr. Verstak (played with prickly relish by "Fargo's" Frances McDormand).



Despite a certain poetry to his words and obvious good intentions, Beresford conducts this distaff "Chorus on the River Kwai" with a heavy hand, finding cliche in place of story.—Susan Lambert

A CHEF IN LOVE ★★

Starring Pierre Richard, Nino Kirtadze and Jean-Yves Gautier. Directed by Nana Dzhordzhadze. Written by Irakli Kvirikadze. Produced by Marc Ruscart. A Sony Classics release. Comedy/drama. French- and Georgian-language; English subtitles. Rated PG-13 for nudity, sexual situations and some images of violence. Running time: 98 min. Opens 4/25.

Diffuse and under-realized, this year's Georgian foreign-language Oscar entry lacks the emotion and consistency to link its disparate narrative threads. With a strange mix of sweet comedy and sour drama, writer Irakli Kvirikadze fails to develop characters and episodes meaningfully, but there are moments of charm and humor that unfortunately become fewer as the film unwinds; director Nana Dzhordzhadze's wavering tone doesn't help.

In a robust yet disciplined performance, Pierre Richard is the film's most delightful asset as a middle-aged French gourmet chef in the 1920s whose passionate affair with a younger Georgian woman (a radiant and spontaneous Nino Kirtadze) turns into tragic melodrama when the Red Army invades his restaurant. Told back and forth in time, from the chef's grown son (an adept Jean-Yves Gautier) reading his father's memoirs in 1995, the story lacks dramatic contrast or thematic significance.—Dale Winogura

TEMPTRESS MOON ★★★1/2

Starring Leslie Cheung and Gong Li. Directed by Chen Kaige. Written by Shu Kei. Produced by Tong Cunlin and Hsu Feng. A Miramax release. Drama. Chinese-language; English subtitles. Rated R for some intense images of sexuality and opium use. Running time: 115 min. Opens 4/18.

It's as a metaphor for China's often turbulent struggle with modernization that "Temptress Moon"—a tragic tone-poem cutting to the heart and soul of a nation's identity—works best. In many ways, Chen Kaige's follow-up to his "Farewell My Concubine" is a more daring effort than anything the famed Chinese stylist has done. It's also one of his more narratively muddled ones. Reteaming Chen with "Concubine" stars Cheung and Gong Li, "Temptress Moon" tells the story of a 1920s-era Shanghai hustler and the rich woman he must seduce.

"Temptress Moon" is one of the most beautiful films ever made. Together with cinematographer Christopher Doyle, Chen has spun a magnificently seductive feverdream torn from the characters' own opium-induced delirium. Dollies, cranes and steadicams navigate the labyrinthine world of colonial Shanghai with acrobatic agility, underscoring their search for stability and equilibrium.—Wade Major

GROSSE POINTE BLANK ★★★★

Starring John Cusack, Minnie Driver and Dan Aykroyd. Directed by George Armitage. Written by Tom Jankiewicz and D.V. DeVincentis & Steve Pink & John Cusack. Produced by Susan Arnold, Donna Arkoff Roth and Roger Birnbaum. A Buena Vista release. Comedy. Not yet rated. Running time: 107 min. Opens 4/11.

Successful, well-respected hitman Martin Blank (John Cusack) loses his passion for his job, so where does he go to "find himself"? His 10-year high school reunion. There is one alumna Martin is particularly excited to see: former flame Debi (Minnie Driver), whom he stood up on prom night

MONTY PYTHON AND THE QUEST FOR THE HOLY GRAIL ★★★1/2

7th Level; Windows CD; $49.99.

Those who've already seen one of the funniest films of all time a half-dozen times or more have asked themselves, "How can I get more 'Holy Grail'?" This CD-ROM is the answer. Die-hard fans typically need hear only a few phrases, such as "we are the knights who say nee" or "it's only a flesh wound," to start smirking and gushing forth with their favorite bits from the movie.

Eric Idle, one of the Python troupe members and here a demented knight, serves as executive co-producer on this title and helps keep the silly quotient high throughout. The packaging touts it as the best strategy game of 932 A.D. The electronic registration of the title is a gag, with questions like: "What is your age?" "What is your quest?" "What is the air speed velocity of an unladen swallow?" If a user responds that he would like to see the entire film, you are treated to a frenetic slide show of about every thousandth frame from the 1975 movie.

The Pythons, who brought you "The Meaning of Life," offer "The Holy Grail" vio CD-ROM.

Some imagery is directly from the film. New voice material is provided by Idle and fellow Python members Terry Gilliam, Michael Palin and Terry Jones. And there is new Terry Gilliam art and animation, including a never-before-released King Brian the Wild scene.

A map appears early on, bearing all the favorite Holy Grail locations: the Plague Village, the Castle Anthrax, Camelot and the Bridge of Death. As in the movie, King Arthur (the user) must find the Grail as he traverses Arthurian England to the sound of clopping coconuts. Five arcade-style games based on scenes from the movie help one gather clues to find the Grail. They include a disgusting game called "Drop Dead," in which a player must tightly pile the bodies of plague victims before they decompose. In "Knights in Combat," one must mortally wound the Black Knight, who is not quick to give up the fight. In "Catch the Cow," large farm animals are hurled at the king by a taunting Frenchman.

Of course, anyone who hasn't seen the film will be totally confused by this point. As with a lot of games, there is no explanation in this CD, so a user can end up clicking mindlessly around the screen to collect objects that will lead to another screen for more clicking. But, at least in this title, amusing things happen when you do. Still, although the developer, 7th Level, is using a more typical gaming model than was used in the "Monty Python's Complete Waste of Time" CD-ROM, it's not as immediately enjoyable.—Ann Kwinn to embark on a life of well-paid violence. While he attempts to win her back, he must also contend with his former mentor (Dan Aykroyd), who's stalking him.

Performances and writing are for the most part successful in their oblique wit. Cusack makes his calm killer charming; Driver is winsome, balancing strength and playfulness; and Aykroyd is his most fun to watch in a long time.—Christine James

TRAVELLER ★★★

Starring Bill Paxton, Julianna Margulies and Mark Wahlberg. Directed by Jack Green. Written by Jim McGlynn. Produced by Bill Paxton, Brian Swardstrom, Mickey Liddell and David Blocker. An October Films release. Drama. Rated R for strong language and violence. Running time: 100 min. Opens in April.

Set within the real-life subculture of scheming Irish gypsies, "Traveller" is most resonant when examining the clan's fiercely tribal instincts. And the gritty-looking film (directed by Oscar-winning cinematographer Jack Green) offers plenty of breezy excitement as two Travellers, Bokky ("Twister's" Bill Paxton) and Pat ("Fear's" Mark Wahlberg), try to rip off various folk.

The film's turning point arrives when Bokky falls for outsider Jean (Julianna Margulies), a single mother who loses her bartending job as a result of one of the duo's scams. But Bokky's moral awakening is a bit cumbersome, and his relationship with Jean lacks a certain obsessive fire. "Traveller" is good when it allows moviegoers the thrill of taking part in the clever trickery, but it's even better when it explores the intense loyalty and Irish-based customs of these masterful thieves.—Jon Matsumoto

KEYS TO TULSA ★★1/2

Starring Eric Stoltz and James Spader. Directed by Leslie Greif. Written by Harley Peyton. Produced by Leslie Greif and Harley Peyton. A Gramercy release. Drama. Rated R. Running time: 112 min. Opens 4/11 ltd.

Prodigal son Richter (Eric Stoltz) returns to his hometown of Tulsa to try for a fresh start, but his high-society mother (Mary Tyler Moore) won't help. Richter must also contend with his feelings toward his sultry former sweetheart, Vicky (Deborah Kara Unger), who's unhappily married with child to Ronnie (James Spader), a cocky lout who Richter owes money, leaving him a pawn in Ronnie's blackmail plan.

Plot and character connections are at first confusing, and all the players are mired in lives of their own creation. The film would have been better as a black comedy, but Richter is too pathetic, causing his caustic barbs and wry observations to fall flat. Unger makes a beautiful but tragic fallen belle, and Spader does noteworthy work. Though twisted and

REVIEWS IN BRIEF

TIMOTHY LEARY'S DEAD ★★

Directed by Paul Davids. Written and produced by Paul Davids and Todd Easton Mills. A Strand release. Documentary. Unrated. Running time: 77 min.

King of psychedelia and LSD advocate Timothy Leary has been the subject of intense scrutiny by the government, the media, his fans and his enemies. But whether he was a freak of nature or a profound thinker is one of the many unanswered questions in Paul Davids and Todd Easton Mills' documentary, "Timothy Leary's Dead."

Interviews with Leary and his friends and associates serve mainly as punchy soundbites in a timeline of the ex-Harvard psychology professor's life. The film doesn't get past Leary's shtick and his glossy eyes; the audience is left with only the image that Leary created of himself.—Lea Russo

EVERYTHING RELATIVE ★★★1/2

Starring Ellen McLaughlin and Olivia Negron. Directed, written and produced by Sharon Pollack. A Tara release. Drama. Unrated. Running time: 110 min.

A heartfelt, touching and lively story, "Everything Relative" is a lesbian version of "The Big Chill." When seven old friends reunite 20 years after college, they discover how far apart they've grown since "coming out" as gay women.

This film is beautifully balanced, with time to develop each member of the ensemble, revealing their strengths and vulnerabilities in the process. The scenes are well-paced with plenty of light-hearted banter, often with sharp-edged double-entendres.—Pat Kramer

THE WATERMELON WOMAN ★★★

Starring Cheryl Dunye and Guin Turner. Directed and written by Cheryl Dunye. Produced by Barry Swimar and Cate Wilson. A First Run release. Drama. Unrated. Running time: 90 min.

Exploring the life of a struggling black lesbian filmmaker (writer/director Cheryl Dunye) as she attempts to uncover and document the world of a virtually unknown and practically forgotten actress from the '30s, "The Watermelon Woman" looks like a high-school video project—intentionally. As her character searches for identity in the face of racial and sexual tensions, Dunye brilliantly creates a faux first-person account.

The only major flaw with this award-winning festival fave is the underdeveloped and overacted character of Tamara (Valarie Walker).—Lea Russo

PARALLEL SONS ★★★

Starring Gabriel Mick and Laurence Mason. Directed and written by John G. Young. Produced by James Spione and Nancy Larsen. A Greycat release. Drama. Unrated. Running time: 93 min.

An unassuming film that tackles the thorny issues of race and sexual preference in an intimate way, "Parallel Sons" is simple but surprisingly thought-provoking about a rural white (Gabriel Mick) and an urban black (Laurence Mason).

A film on an unlikely friendship is hardly original, but "Parallel Sons'" writer/director John G. Young has a fine sense of the particular and provides rich characterizations. The film takes a far darker turn than audiences might expect as the meaning of its enigmatic title is revealed. Mick and Mason are both charismatic and believable young performers, and the film looks beautiful, thanks in part to fine use of lush locations.—Cathy Thompson-Georges

BOYFRIENDS ★★

Starring James Dreyfus, Michael Unwin and David Coffey. Directed, written and produced by Neil Hunter and Tom Hunsinger. A First Run release. Comedy. Unrated. Running time: 85 min.

In their contemporary take on gay romance, writer/directors Neil Hunter and Tom Hunsinger explore the turbulent relationships of three very different couples on an Easter weekend in the country.

"Boyfriends" suffers from too many soap-opera-like subplots that seem set up to create tension, rather than develop the characters or shed light on the relationships. As a result, the film feels contrived, trying to sustain our interest with unscrupulous liaisons. There are moments of true insight, but they're undermined by the melodrama.—Lea Russo

MENMANIACS ★★

Starring Thomas Karasch and Paul Smith. Directed by Jochen Hick. A Turbulent Arts release. Documentary. Unrated. Running time: 86 min.

For audiences turned on by the S&M scene, "Menmaniacs" (subtitled "The Legacy of Leather") offers plenty of sweaty, writhing male torsos clad in bondage gear, but not much else. Despite a few interesting interviews with gay men and some discussion of the AIDS issue, the documentary is a surface-deep and overlong glimpse into aberrant sexual practices that's strictly for the converted.—Dale Winogura

LE SAMOURAI ★★★★

Starring Alain Delon, Francois Perier, Nathalie Delon and Caty Rosier. Directed and written by Jean-Pierre Melville. Produced by Eugene Lepicier. An Artificial Eye re-release. Thriller. French-language; English subtitles. Unrated. Running time: 95 min.

Long overshadowed by his New Wave contemporaries during the '50s and '60s, French auteur Jean-Pierre Melville has only recently received a proper reconsideration, thanks primarily to the likes of John Woo and Quentin Tarantino, both of whom cite Melville's rugged, noirish gangster thrillers as seminal influences on their own work.

For audiences unfamiliar with the Melville touch, this restored print of his 1967 masterpiece is an excellent place to start. As the title hints, "Le Samourai" analogizes the Bushido, or warrior code of Japan's famed swordsmen, to the life of a cold contract killer named Jef (Alain Delon).

Anchored by Delon's chillingly icy performance, "Le Samourai" is a superbly crafted blend of intrigue and style that far outclasses the era's better-known French thrillers, most of them made by Melville's friend Claude Chabrol. (Melville appeared as an actor in Chabrol's "Landru.") Where Chabrol's once innovative approach now seems dated and mundane, Melville's remains vibrant and stirring, buoyed by a subtle stylization that predates similar work in Francis Ford Coppola's "Godfather" films and Sergio Leone's "Once Upon a Time in America." More striking yet are the dozen or so similarities to Woo's own "The Killer," as if almost to suggest that some of the greatest films of cinema's future may well come from the art's past.—Wade Major

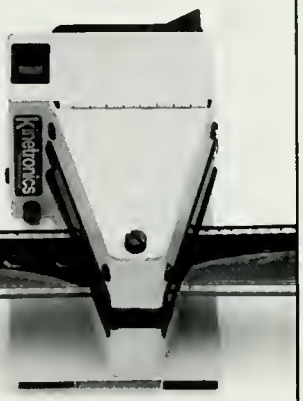
SHOOTING PORN ★

Starring Chi Chi La Rue and Gino Colbert. Directed by Ronnie Larsen. Produced by Caryn Horwitz and Doug Lindeman. A Caryn Horwitz release. Documentary. Unrated. Running time: 75 min.

"Shooting Porn" would indeed be a perfect name for this project, if the filmmakers had thought to put the word "Gay" in the middle. As it stands, there's a chance that an untold number of straight male moviegoers, perhaps emboldened by cinema's recent takes on Larry Flynt and Al Goldstein, might slink in expecting an entirely different take on eroticism.

Fans of homoerotics, however, could be entranced by such scenes as an actor taking an enema, or discourses on how a Hitler-moustache trim of pubic hair can make a man's genitals look larger on camera. And more power to that specialized demographic, for they're the only possible audience for this film.—Sean O'Neill

FOLLOW ME HOME ★★1/2



Starring Alfre Woodard, Benjamin Bratt, Jesse Borrego and Steve Reevis. Directed, written and produced by Peter Bratt. A New Millenia release. Drama. Unrated. Running time: 120 min.

This first feature by independent filmmaker Peter Bratt is an overtly political look at race relations and issues of cultural colonialism in American society. Made on a microbudget, "Follow Me Home" still has a look and level of technical polish that rivals mainstream product; it also has a few mainstream problems.

The story: Four street artists (two Latino, one American Indian, one black) take a road trip. Bratt's simple, effective conceit: All the "bad guys" they meet are white. Nothing implausible happens, but the believability and dramatic impact of many scenes are hampered by uneven levels of acting ability. A series of B&W fantasy scenes are heavy-handed, ruining points made elsewhere in well-written character interactions.—Alex Albanese unsuspenseful, "Keys to Tulsa" is an interesting character study.—Christine James

LEO TOLSTOY'S ANNA KARENINA ★★1/2

Starring Sophie Marceau, Sean Bean, Alfred Molina and Mia Kirshner. Directed and written by Bernard Rose. Produced by Bruce Davey. A Warner Bros. release. Drama. Rated PG-13 for mature thematic elements and some sensuality/nudity. Running time: 108 min.

In speeding through Tolstoy's massive work, this Icon production does only partial justice to its two narratives: That of the despairing Levin, who leaves society behind and finds salvation working his rural estate with his similarly transformed wife, the princess Kitty ("The Crow: City of Angels'" Mia Kirshner); and the central story, that of the wife Anna ("Braveheart's" Sophie Marceau) who, unhappy with her marriage to the wealthy but older Karenin (James Fox), has a passionate affair with the dashing officer Count Vronsky ("GoldenEye's" Sean Bean).

In this Bernard Rose ("Immortal Beloved") adaptation, Levin's ennui, Anna's despondency and Vronsky's principles are barely sketched, leaving their narrative arcs broken at the beginning. As a waveringly accented Anna, Marceau gives fire to her interludes with Vronsky but lacks the hauteur for the fall. Similarly, Bean has the chin but not the regal reserve. As Levin, the gap-toothed Molina has Levin's soul, but like Kirshner has too little screen time. When at tale's end Anna meets her fate under the locomotive's wheels, the audience feels the tragedy of the act, but with the suspicion that the train arrived ahead of schedule.—Kim Williamson

THE DEVIL'S OWN ★★

Starring Harrison Ford and Brad Pitt. Directed by Alan Pakula. Written by Kevin Jarre and Robert Mark Kamen. Produced by Lawrence Gordon and Robert Colesberry. A Columbia release. Action/drama. Rated R for strong brutal violence, and for language. Running time: 110 min.

IRA leader Frankie McGuire (Brad Pitt) exits Ireland for America. His mission: procure stinger missiles. He stays with a New York City police officer, Sgt. O'Meara (Harrison Ford), who—not knowing his boarder's true identity—befriends him. McGuire has a perfect hiding place—until his terrorist past catches up with him and places O'Meara and his family in jeopardy.

Only in the last fourth do the two leads get to mix it up, but the one-on-one climax is nowhere close to being as good as what audiences might expect with these two boxoffice titans; its utter predictability diminishes any intended suspense.

The movie's draggy pace is also surprising. That slowness allows the filmmakers to enrich their tale with bonding drama—"The Devil's Own" has the feel of the art-house about it that one might expect of foreign-language fare—but in the action department overall "The Devil's Own" doesn't deliver. This one will need the luck of the Irish to deliver and keep broad mainstream numbers.—Dwayne E. Leslie

SELENA ★★★

Starring Jennifer Lopez, Edward James Olmos and Jon Seda. Directed and written by Gregory Nava. Produced by Moctesuma Esparza and Robert Katz. A Warner Bros. release. Drama. Rated PG for some mild language and thematic elements. Running time: 127 min.

As Tejano superstar Selena, Jennifer Lopez ("Blood and Wine") is sensational. She not only looks remarkably like the late singer, but she radiates the energy, warmth, style and magnetism for which Selena was known. As a whole, though, the film suffers from some of the usual flaws of a mainstream music biopic.

That includes syrupy incidental music (Selena's songs, lipsynched by Lopez, are terrific); retro split-screen concert scenes; and schmaltzy moments between characters. Except for Selena's father (Edward James Olmos), the supporting characters are too good to be true, never losing their tempers or becoming jealous. Like the English-language album she worked on before her murder, "Selena" (too ardently) aims for crossover appeal.—Jean Oppenheimer

LIAR, LIAR ★★★

Starring Jim Carrey, Maura Tierney and Justin Cooper. Directed by Tom Shadyac. Written by Paul Guay and Stephen Mazur. Produced by Brian Grazer. A Universal release. Comedy. Rated PG-13 for sex-related humor and language. Running time: 86 min.

The human cartoon is back with a vengeance. After his detour into black comedy with "The Cable Guy," Jim Carrey returns to boxoffice-demolishing form with "Liar, Liar," a largely formulaic entry in the "neglectful dad" sweepstakes that's just hilarious enough to restore trust in his bankability.

Carrey plays a hopelessly dishonest (and successful) attorney. His young son Max (Justin Cooper), in a moment of love and disappointment, makes a birthday wish for his dad to get through just one day without lying. Amazingly, the wish comes true—and thus open the floodgates of comedy.

However unremarkable, "Liar, Liar" still has the distinction of actually having a narrative, an element lacking in most of the actor's outings. And Carrey has his first-ever chance to act, creating surprisingly watchable moments of emotion between the obligatory outbursts.—Wade Major

SMILLA'S SENSE OF SNOW ★★

Starring Julia Ormond and Gabriel Byrne. Directed by Bille August. Written by Ann Biderman. Produced by Bernd Eichinger and Martin Moszkowicz. A Fox Searchlight release. Drama. Rated R for language, some violence and a sex scene. Run time: 127 min.

The elements of "Smilla's Sense of Snow," a German/Danish/Swedish co-production led by Constantin Film, are themselves an amalgam: Mainstream dashes of "Jurassic Park," "Outbreak" and James Bond make an uneasy mix with fine mathematical philosophizing, iceberg-panderous plotting and blue-ice cinematography

SANTA BARBARA FEST

SHALL WE DANCE? ★★★1/2

Starring Koji Yasuyo, Tamiyo Kusakari and Naato Takenaka. Directed and written by Masayuki Suo. Produced by Shoji Masui and Yuji Ogata. A Miramax release. Comedy. Japanese-language; English subtitles. Rated PG for mild language. Running time: 122 min. Screened at the Santa Barbara fest. Opens 5/16 NY/LA.

Given the success of the hugely popular Australian indie "Strictly Ballroom," many viewers will no doubt come to "Shall We Dance?" expecting more of the same. But this Japanese film is far more sympathetic to its characters than the sometimes freakish Luhrmann film, treating them with humanity and respect. Whereas the earlier movie was a parade of garish costumes and human grotesques, "Shall We Dance?" is a gentle examination of the graceful appeal of ballroom dance, using it as a metaphor for human longings for beauty and release.

"Shall We Dance?" opens like a midlife crisis romance. A Tokyo salaryman (Koji Yasuyo) becomes captivated by a beautiful woman (Tamiyo Kusakari) who, on his way home, he glimpses in the window of a dance studio; he pursues lessons to win her eye. What begins as infatuation for a young woman, however, develops into a love of dance, and our hero finds himself caught up in a world far outside his office—of tango and quickstep, dance competitions and weekend dance halls. What he really wants, it seems, is not a fling but the chance to spread his wings outside the stifling confines of his office and the regimentation of Japanese life.

"Shall We Dance?" abounds with charming small maments: An older instructor (Naoto Takenaka) whirls the bashful beginner through a dancehall as she explains her love for "The King and I"; the simple salaryman practices dance steps in the rain beside a train platform; and an office colleague (Akira Emoto) proves to have a second life as a flamboyant, bewigged king of Latin dance. The cast is uniformly winning, especially the handsome Yasuyo, as he graws from stumbling beginner into an assured and tuxedoed dancer. The film relies a little too heavily on a subplot about a dancer who has fallen in competition, but this is a cavil; "Shall We Dance?" is a light-footed Japanese film that invites American audiences to love it.—Cathy Thompson-Georges more suitable to the art house. In adapting Danish novelist Peter Hoeg's book (published stateside as "Miss Smilla's Feeling for Snow") about a Inuit/American woman (Julia Ormond) seeking the truth about a young boy's death, Danish director Bille August ("Jerusalem") and American screenwriter Ann Biderman ("Primal Fear") have triumphed in making a frigidly beautiful film full of sinister intrigue and psychological conflict but have failed to make that intrigue plausible or that conflict emotionally important.—Kim Williamson

love jones ★★★1/2

Starring Larenz Tate, Nia Long and Isaiah Washington. Directed and written by Theodore Witcher. Produced by Nick Wechsler and Jeremiah Samuels. A New Line release. Romantic comedy. Rated R for language and sexuality. Running time: 110 min.

At last, a romantic drama has been written for an all-black cast featuring intelligent dialogue, an insightful and well-acted plot, and a showcase of the actors as genuine human beings. "love jones" tells the story of a group of young black adults and their viewpoints and misconceptions regarding finding love and holding on to it.

Inspired by his college-days experiences, writer/director Theodore Witcher in his directorial debut gives audiences a new perspective on educated blacks. His talented ensemble depicts the conflicts and challenges presented by love in funny and poignant fashion.—Pat Kramer

JUNGLE 2 JUNGLE ★★1/2

Starring Tim Allen, Sam Huntington, Martin Short and Lolita Davidovich. Directed by John Pasquin. Written by Bruce A. Evans and Raynold Gideon. Produced by Brian Reilly. A Buena Vista release. Comedy. Rated PG for some mild violence and language. Running time: 105 min.

This remake of "Un Indien Dans La Ville" (released last year stateside as "Little Indian, Big City") is simplistic but family-friendly fare. Tim Allen plays Michael, a self-absorbed commodities broker who wants to marry the beautiful but shallow Charlotte (Lolita Davidovich). But first he must travel to a South American isle to get a divorce pact from his estranged wife (JoBeth Williams); there he finds and brings back a loinclothed 13-year-old son (Sam Huntington). Mayhem ensues predictably. "Jungle 2 Jungle" will satisfy kids and undemanding audiences with its even but unambitious humor, its good pace and warm-heartedness.—Christine James

PRIVATE PARTS ★★★1/2

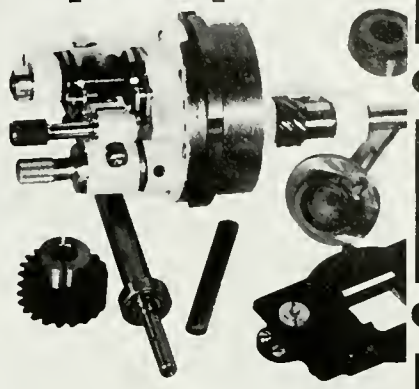
Starring Howard Stern. Directed by Betty Thomas. Written by Len Blum and Michael Kalesniko. Produced by Ivan Reitman. A Paramount release. Comedy. Rated R for strong language, nudity and crude sexual humor. Running time: 109 min.

Digitally enhanced breasts. Fartman. Minuscule schlongers. Puppet intercourse. D-cup porn starlets. Wet underwear. Woofer sex. Hot lesbo action. It's Howard!

Assuredly directed by Betty Thomas ("The Brady Bunch") and smoothly adapted by Len Blum and Michael Kalesniko, shockjock Stern's bio is comically affectionate and almost low-key, with Stern downright warm. But, reportage not cinema, it progresses like real life, not art. And the laughs, while plentiful, don't fill in all the quiet holes where a real narrative would live. Still, the real laugh is Howard's, all the way to the bank.—Kim Williamson

BERLIN FEST

TWIN TOWN ★★1/2



Starring Dougray Scott, Dorien Thomas, Rhys Ifans, Llyr Evans, William Thomas, Sue Roderick, Jenny Evans and Rachel Scorgie. Directed by Kevin Allen. Written by Paul Durden and Kevin Allen. Produced by Peter McAleese. A Gramercy release. Drama/comedy. Not yet rated. Running time: 99 min. Screened at the Berlin fest. Opens 5/9 NY/LA, 5/23 exp.

"Pretty, shitty city" were the words poet Paul Durden came up with as a suggested replacement for poet Dylan Thomas's tag "ugly lovely town." Both were in reference to Swansea in South West Wales, the locale for the story Durden has concocted with director Kevin Allen for the movie "Twin Town." It's a setting where there are no holds barred in terms of bad behavior, criminal shenanigans and obscene language.

The plotline about petty criminals and corrupt cops doing themselves and each other down is nothing special, but there is vigor to all the characters, humor (both blunt and sick) to the storytelling, and energy to the acting and filmmaking. The experience is a bit like savoring a bad smell—the tendency to hold one's nose undercut by the desire to sneak just a whiff because there's something in the air that speaks true about life as a whole, and it might all point to a good laugh in the end.

"Twin Town" is an intensely regional film that, despite its heavy accents, speaks a universal language about human small-mindedness and resilience. All the actors clearly relish the chance to be seedy, lewd, rude, duplicitous, warped, crudely sexy, basically irredeemable, but somehow still people one might just about tolerate. Only now and then are the inside jokes obviously from folks who know the scene too well and want to parody it a bit too much, visible in this colorful splurge of a stew into which has been thrown almost everything a "pretty, shitty" mind can dream up, including a dead dog and a massed Welsh choir.—Bridget Byrne

GENTLEMEN DON'T EAT POETS ★1/2

Starring Sting, Alan Bates and Theresa Russell. Directed by John-Paul Davidson. Written by Patrick McGrath. Produced by Trudie Styler. A Live release. Comedy. Rated R for sexuality and some gore. Running time: 98 min.

"Gentlemen Don't Eat Poets" is a schizophrenic film providing, at best, lukewarm entertainment value. Chosen by the film's producer, Trudie Styler, as an acting vehicle for her rock star/actor/husband Sting ("Plenty"), the film is sketchy in plot and incoherent in its efforts to bring to the screen Patrick McGrath's mystery novel "The Grotesque."

"Gentlemen Don't Eat Poets" has potential for black comedy but is so lacking in direction that it falls far short of that goal. Filmed in just six weeks' time, "Gentlemen Don't Eat Poets" will be remembered for what it is: a film created as a vehicle for Sting by his wife.—Pat Kramer

CITY OF INDUSTRY ★★1/2

Starring Harvey Keitel, Stephen Dorff, Famke Janssen. Directed by John Irvin. Written by Ken Solarz. Produced by Evzen Kolar and Ken Solarz. An Orion release. Action/drama. Rated R for strong language, violence and some sexuality. Running time: 136 min.

What hath Quentin Tarantino wrought? "City of Industry" is in a long line of slick-yet-gritty, bloody-hip imitators. Only Harvey Keitel's redoubtable presence, and an intriguing glimpse at the dusty underbelly of Los Angeles, provide reasons to watch this Largo production.

The one place where the film feels fresh is its look at L.A.'s rarely filmed eastern suburbs, shabby and burglar-barred. Also intriguing is the meeting of black and Chinese gang elements in the underworld, but this isn't really explored, just used to provide a little Chinatown color to the proceedings. Keitel is fine and looks convincing with a gun in his hand, but he could do this role in his sleep. Despite its labor-union title, "City of Industry" doesn't really work.—Cathy Thompson-Georges

RHYME & REASON ★★1/2

Directed by Peter Spirer. Produced by Chuck Block. A Miramax release. Documentary. Rated R for pervasive strong language and some drug content. Running time: 90 min.

A serious attempt to document the history and cultural values of rap and hip-hop, "Rhyme & Reason" skates too slickly over the surface of its subject to thoroughly mine the depths. Well shot in 16mm over several years, the film—thanks to director Peter Spirer—employs a rapid-fire barrage of interviews with various rap performers as they discuss the whys and wherefors of the music industry and their own pasts.

Unfortunately, as concentrated as Spirer's technique is, "Rhyme & Reason" remains a series of visual sound bytes that don't reveal enough of the artistic and personal causes of the musicians. But the film's strength lies in putting a human face on rap and hip-hop.—Dale Winogura

BOOTY CALL ★★★1/2

Starring Jamie Foxx and Tommy Davidson. Directed by Jeff Pollack. Written by Takashi Burrord and Bootsie. Produced by John Morrissey. A Columbia release. Comedy. Rated R for nonstop sexuality including sex-related dialogue and humor, and for strong language. Running time: 80 min.

"Booty Call" marks the first re-teaming of Davidson and Foxx since their days together on Fox TV's "In Living Color." Davidson, a funny comedian, is oddly cast as a straight man in this two-guys-on-a-double-date tale; on the other hand, Foxx's Bunz has wit streaming from his pores.

But both actors profit from being given the freedom to improvise. The film crosses color lines and makes fun of every race; a highlight is a conversation spoken by Foxx in Cantonese, leaving the Asian extras in even more shock than audiences will be. "Booty Call" is funny throughout (not wanting to miss a trick, the filmmakers even give a dog subtitles for his barking), although the majority of laughs come in the first half.—Dwayne E. Leslie

THAT DARN CAT ★★

Starring Christina Ricci and Doug E. Doug. Directed by Bob Spiers. Written by S.M. Alexander and L.A. Karaszewski. Produced by Robert Simonds. A Buena Vista release. Comedy. Rated PG for mild thematic elements. Running time: 90 min.

Christina Ricci is again called on to be a black-garbed caustic misfit in this remake of the 1965 Hayley Mills starrer "That Darn Cat." Scripters Scott Alexander and Larry Karaszewski, best known for the eccentric "Ed Wood" and "The People vs. Larry Flynt," lay on wacky, oblique touches, but the screenplay seems to be in a tug-of-war between dumbing-down and smartening-up.

Tracking a cat's hijinks may be six-year-olds' idea of high comedy, but the story needed to have deductive reasoning, not fluke happenstance, solve the case to hold their parents' interest.—Christine James

VEGAS VACATION ★1/2

Starring Chevy Chase, Beverly D'Angelo and Randy Quaid. Directed by Stephen Kessler. Written by Elisa Bell. Produced by Jerry Weintraub and R.J. Louis. A Warner Bros. release. Comedy. Rated PG for sensuality, language and thematic elements. Running time: 95 min.

The Griswold family adventures have always had a flair for mind-numbing slapstick humor, but "Vegas Vacation," the latest in the formulaic comedies starring Chevy Chase and Beverly D'Angelo, is so far from funny it's actually painful to sit through.

Here, Chase's bumbling husband comes across as pathetic, a death-knell even for a comic hero; the only scenes that give a glimpse of the original hilarity of this series are those involving D'Angelo's Ellen, who becomes star-struck by sugary Vegas headliner Wayne Newton.—Pat Kramer

ABSOLUTE POWER ★★★

Starring Clint Eastwood. Directed by Clint Eastwood. Written by William Goldman. Produced by Clint Eastwood and Karen Spiegel. A Columbia release. Thriller. Rated R for violence, sexuality and language. Running time: 122 min.

In "Absolute Power," a thriller about a sex murder involving the president of the United States, everyone is morally tainted. The movie's moral center, ironically, is jewel thief Luther Whitney (Clint Eastwood, also directing and producing), who witnesses the crime and, guilt-ridden over his own passivity, decides not to let the president (Gene Hackman) and his aides cover it up.

As adapted by William Goldman from a novel by David Baldacci, the movie to keep Luther alive piles on so many contrivances that it becomes absurd. And, in opting for one-dimensional caricatures, the movie seems to be winking at the audience, as if to say such things couldn't really happen here. "Absolute Power" would have been more genuinely disturbing if the president had been portrayed not as monstrous but as a genial moral weakling like...so many other Oval Office occupants.—Joe McBride

GOLDWYN UPPED AT PARAMOUNT

John Goldwyn, president of production at Paramount's Motion Picture Group for the past six years, has signed a new five-year contract, under which he'll be promoted to the newly-created position of president of Paramount Motion Pictures. The move leaves open his old post, which insiders say may eventually be filled by current executive vice president of production Michelle Manning. Goldwyn is the grandson of legendary producer Samuel Goldwyn and the son of Samuel Goldwyn Jr., chairman and CEO of Goldwyn Entertainment Co.

In his new position, Goldwyn will continue to oversee production at Paramount, but will now become more involved in long-term strategic planning for the studio. Goldwyn began his career in 1982 as executive story editor for producer Alan Ladd Jr. After a stint at MGM, Goldwyn joined Paramount in 1990 as executive vice president of production. He was promoted to president of production in 1991. Films produced and released under his tenure include "The First Wives Club," "Star Trek: First Contact," "Mission: Impossible," "Braveheart" and "Forrest Gump."

NATHANSON FILLS MARCUS SLOT AT MGM

Metro Goldwyn Mayer Inc. chairman Frank Mancuso brought in New Regency Prods. chairman and CEO Michael Nathanson to replace Mike Marcus (who resigned in February) as head of MGM Pictures. New Regency's president David Matalong said the departure came with the company's blessing and hopes it will help along discussions for possible co-productions between the two companies. There is some talk that when New Regency's deal is up at Warner Bros. in 1998, they might find a new home at MGM. During his tenure at New Regency, Nathanson was responsible for "A Time to Kill," "Tin Cup," "Natural Born Killers" and the first two "Free Willy" films. Before joining New Regency in 1994, Nathanson was a production executive at Columbia Pictures under the Peter Guber/Jon Peters regime.

DREAMWORKS BACK AT THE DRAWING BOARD FOR A SITE

Another setback has arisen in DreamWorks' efforts to build itself a studio. The deal with financier Gary Winnick to take over a majority stake in the Playa Vista develoment and cover the $150 million debt was never signed, and Robert Maguire, lead developer on the Maguire Thomas Partners project, is now negotiating with other parties to invest the monies needed to keep the banks at bay. Some industry sources say Maguire was never entirely comfortable with the Winnick group, which would have had the largest stake in the project. Maguire was reportedly unhappy with comments made by Winnick about taking over the project, which has been a long-held dream of Maguire's.

The agreement in principal was never signed because of legal issues. So DreamWorks continues to look elsewhere for a studio. Alternatives under consideration include a location in Burbank and a site next to the Dreamworks animation campus which is currently under construction in Glendale. There is even talk of staying put on the Universal lot. None of those options hold the allure of the Playa Vista project, so it remains to be seen what will become of DreamWorks: The Studio.

Meanwhile, DreamWorks plans to open a New York office in June to handle East Coast distribution and marketing. Located on the 22nd floor of 650 Madison Avenue, the offices will serve as home to approximately 10 employees and will be a base for visiting executives. Production offices already exist in New York at Chelsea Piers on the Hudson River.

NEW LINE LOOKS TO EUROPE FOR INVESTORS

New Line Cinema, which has been looking for money to maintain its independence from Time Warner, may have found what it's looking for in Europe. A European consortium led by French media giant Havas and U.K. broadcaster Carlton Communications. New Line chairman Robert Shaye and COO Michael Lynne began discussions last year with Havas for the Havas-Carlton contingent to make a significant investment in New Line.

New Line and Havas already formed a joint venture in 1995, NHVL, to invest in interactive games and software following a successful partnership on the interactive game for the New Line film "The Mask." Havas is the second largest publicly held media group in France. The investment, if it goes through, will allow Shaye and Lynne to keep control over the company they founded.

DISNEY PICKS UP CINERGI ENERGY

Walt Disney Pictures bought Cinergi Pictures Entertainment Inc. for an estimated $20 million after more than six months of discussions between the two. Andy Vajna, who owns 58 percent of Cinergi, put the company on the market a year ago. Insiders say that rising production costs made it difficult to continue to do the big-budget studio films that Vajna favored and that Vajna was not happy with Cinergi's move to smaller-budgeted pictures. Disney seemed the most logical buyer since it has 16 pictures outstanding on a 25-picture distribution deal with the company. Additionally, Disney already owned five percent of Cinergi's stock and had been lending money to the company to help fund production costs. Disney looked to acquire the company last summer, but did not. But perhaps faced with the prospect of entanglements with other buyers or trying to recoup its production advances (listed at $35.4 million) from a company in liquidation (which was increasingly becoming a possibility), the studio decided to go ahead with the deal.

Potential suitors had included Arnon Milchan's New Regency Enterprises, Mike Medavoy's Phoenix Pictures and Jim Robinson at Morgan Creek Productions. Although Cinergi posted losses in 1995 and early 1996, "Evita," which grossed $132 million to date worldwide, should ensure a positive fourth quarter. Disney will now have access to Cinergi's small library which includes "Evita" as well as less-than-successful films such as "Nixon" and "The Scarlet Letter."

SUSPECTS ARRESTED IN SILENT MOVIE MURDER

In a tragic and strange development that could have come straight out of a film noir, the murder of theatre owner Lawrence Austin (reported in the April issue of Boxoffice) is close to being solved, but what the LAPD has uncovered is quite a bit more complicated, if, regrettably enough, a little more understandable, than the seemingly senseless robbery/murder that shocked the exhibition world.

The LAPD has arrested two suspects in the killing of Austin, the owner/operator of the Silent Movie Showcase in Los Angeles. James Leslie Van Sickle, 34, of Los Angeles, and Christian Rodriguez, 19, of South Gate, Calif., are being held without bail for the January 17th murder. The 74-year-old Austin was killed in the lobby and a 19-year-old theatre employee (who survived) was shot while working the concession stand in what was originally believed to be a robbery. Now LAPD homicide detectives say it looks like a contract killing. Van Sickle, who hoped to inherit Austin's estate (which may be worth almost $1 million), allegedly hired Rodriguez to kill Austin for approximately $25,000. Austin's will apparently gave Van Sickle ownership of the theatre, its entire library of silent films and $80,000 in a bank account. LAPD officer John Miller said Van Sickle had been Austin's roommate and business partner for seven years. Van Sickle often worked as a projectionist and was at the theatre the night of the murder. Both suspects are charged with murder, attempted murder, two counts of robbery and one count of commercial burglary. Deputy District Attorney Curtis Hazell said it was not yet determined if the special circumstances of lying in wait and murder for financial gain would be used to seek the death penalty.

In a further twist, police are now investigating whether Austin even legitimately owned the theatre. Austin may have defrauded the theatre's original owners in order to acquire the Silent Movie Showcase. John and Dorothy Hampton opened the theatre in 1942 and ran it for 37 years until John Hampton fell ill. Austin, a family friend, reopened the theatre in 1991, shortly after John Hampton died. Dorothy Hampton, who lives in a nursing home since a stroke left her with diminished capacities, apparently signed over the theatre to Austin three years ago.

Canadian News Notes by Shlomo Schwartzberg

LEAD STORY: MAJOR "PLAYER"

Famous Players has announced the largest expansion in its 77-year history. The Canadian chain plans an additional 13 theatres, encompassing 136 screens and more than 39,000 seats. The 13 theatres will be added in four provinces—Ontario, British Columbia, Manitoba and Alberta—and the final builds are expected to be completed by May of 1999. The expansion will cost Famous Players more than C$75 million (US$51.7 million) and will create an estimated 1,500 jobs. The new theatres will feature spacious tiered seating, digital sound and such innovations as Starbucks coffee in lobby cafes and Techtown, featuring Sega and other computer games.

"We need to rebuild and reconfigure the existing circuit to meet the demand of moviegoing in the '90s," Roger Harris, Famous Players' vice president and general manager of marketing and theatre operations, told Boxoffice. The expansion will "showcase more variety on screens and better presentation [of films]," says Harris. "By providing more services and options in the lobby, we will encourage more people to spend time with Famous Players."

The 136 proposed screens will mark a 25 percent increase in Famous' total screens: Famous currently boasts 511 screens in 110 locations across Canada.

Recent add-ons in Burlington, Calgary and Moncton have been enormous successes, says Harris. "People come back and say 'Moviegoing is a bigger part of our life.'" He says that "Calgary did over and above what we anticipated," adding that one million patrons came to that city's new multiplex in its first year of operations.

The new theatres will make up the final wave of Famous Players' total 250-screen expansion, which began with a 50-screen expansion in 1996. "That investment will put us in a strong position in the marketplace, [and will] keep us in a strong position in the [next] 10 years." Harris says. Announcements of additional new projects are still forthcoming, but Famous' expansion will be essentially "scaled down" as the company enters the next century, according to Harris.

ASTRAL BACK ON DISTRIBUTION PLANE

After a brief scaling-back of its theatrical distribution efforts, Astral Distribution is back in the game, says its newly appointed director of theatrical distribution Jim Murphy. "We're going to be more aggressive," he said. Astral is currently distributing "Breaking The Waves," and its forthcoming slate includes several major titles, including Giles Walker's "Never Too Late," Volker Schlondorff's "The Ogre" and the controversial Tilda Swinton movie "Female Perversions." "We will [also] have a presence in Cannes," says Murphy, the former director of sales and distribution for the Ontario Film Development Corp. He conceded that the company was wrong to minimize its distribution as it had done of late. "There is a greater awareness and understanding that theatrical is a driving engine. You have got to have a theatrical presence [in the field]."

The distribution arm's parent, Astral Communications, is now called Coscient/Astral, after its purchase by the Quebec-based Coscient Inc. As a result of its combining with Quebec distribution company Allegro, another name change is imminent, says Murphy.

CINEPLEX, PROJECTIONISTS SETTLE DISPUTE

After nearly five months, Cineplex Odeon has come to an agreement with its projectionists in Ontario. The dispute centered around wages and hours, which Cineplex wanted to cut down, citing new technologies that have made the projectionists' jobs less vital.

Under the new agreement, projectionists' salaries go down by almost half to C$14-16 (US$9.66-11.04) an hour for a 40-hour work week or an annual salary of C$29,000-33,000 (US$20,000-22,750). In addition, 49 of the projectionists out of 102 who were locked out lost their jobs, due to a new agreement under which Cineplex will not employ projectionists in houses with three screens or less—theatre managers will do the job—and will use one instead of two projectionists in houses with eight screens or more. "It was a fair and equitable agreement, given the requirements of [the job]," said Howard Lichtman, Cineplex Odeon's executive vice president of marketing, who adds that Cineplex will offer a 26-week severance package to its laid off workers and access to a job education retraining fund, "which we are not obliged" to do.

Robert Hilder, a spokesman for Local 173, which represents projectionists in Ontario, said that "the members aren't very happy" with the strike's final outcome. Hilder expressed worries that projectionists at Famous Players will face the same difficulties when their contracts expire there on July 3. Asked about the situation at his company, Roger Harris of Famous Players said "the issues are very similar. [We face] the same challenges as Cineplex. The degree of difficulty in performing that function has been removed. [We need to find] a fair wage in the context of [the demands of the job]."

POLYGRAM TO SET UP FILM COMPANY IN CANADA

Netherlands-based music and movie company PolyGram NV has secured an agreement with the Canadian government to set up a film company in Canada. Originally, Polygram had hoped to be able to release films directly in Canada, as Hollywood studios do, circumventing existing regulations on distribution and foreign investment in cultural industries. But Canada's government vetoed that proposal, instead allowing PolyGram Filmed Entertainment (PFE) to only distribute movies it made or owns the rights to sell in all international markets. This ensures that PolyGram will not restrict its Canadian titles to niche marketing, but instead will have a commitment to distribute the films internationally, thereby helping to boost the Canadian film industry. Under the deal, PFE has agreed to invest at least C$20 million (US$13.8 million) in backing Canadian films and film festivals, and distributing Canadian films internationally. The reason Hollywood studios are able to distribute in Canada without restriction is that they were active in the Canadian market before the 1988 film distributors policy was enacted, under which film distributors must use a percentage of their profits to make domestic movies and market them internationally.

THE FINNISH LINE: NORDIC 40-PLEX SETS NEW RECORD

Finnkino, the largest circuit in Finland, will soon have another superlative to add to its credit: the company plans to build the world's first 40-plex—a staggering figure, given that the U.S. industry is only now rising to the 30-screen benchmark. The 3,500-seat behemoth will be located in downtown Helsinki and is scheduled to open in October 1998. Finnkino, owned by the newspaper and kiosk chain Rautakirja, currently operates 82 screens.

REGAL BUYS 95 SCREENS FROM MAGIC CINEMAS

Michael Campbell, president and CEO of Regal Cinemas, announced the signing of a definitive asset purchase agreement with Magic Cinemas LLC, an independent theatre company with operations in New Jersey and Pennsylvania (not to be confused with the Loews-owned Magic Johnson Theatres). Regal will pay $24.5 million in cash to purchase the 36 screens in five theatres that Magic Cinemas currently has in operation, the 52 screens in four theatres under development, and a seven-screen addition to an existing theatre. Campbell says that Regal "will continue to pursue appropriate acquisition opportunities aggressively," and that the circuit has more than 900 new screens either under construction or in pre-construction development that are scheduled to be open by the end of 1998.

NATIONAL AMUSEMENTS SPRINGS MORE SCREENS ON SPRINGDALE

National Amusements wants to double patrons' pleasure with double the screens at their Showcase Cinemas in Springdale, Ohio. The nine-plex will be expanded to an 18-plex, making it the largest cinema complex in greater Cincinnati. The cinema will be open during renovations, with the new screens set for operation in summer of 1998. Each auditorium in the 5,600-seat Springdale 18 will be equipped with Dolby Digital sound. The lobby will reflect National Amusements' trademark design, with glass ceilings, neon Hollywood-motifed sculptures and an art gallery of famous movie scenes and stars.

CINEMASTAR SCREENS TO TOTAL 157

Rising star CinemaStar, the San Diego-based chain with 64 screens in Southern California, has announced an aggressive theatre expansion program with plans to increase their screen count to 157 over the next 18 months. The circuit has sites planned in Tijuana, Mexico; Guadalajara, Mexico; and Kona, Hawaii, marking CinemaStar's first forays outside of Southern California. Several SoCal sites are planned as well, including San Bernardino, San Marcos, South Gate and Palm Springs. Also in the works is a five-screen addition to CinemaStar's first multiplex, the Mission Marketplace 8 in Oceanside, Calif.

CinemaStar is also in talks with commercial real estate developer J.H. Snyder Company to build multiplexes in major retail entertainment centers to be developed in California and Nevada over the next five years. If the agreement is completed, CinemaStar would have through the combined expansion an estimated 460 screens in 35 theatres by 2002.

SOUND BITES: NEWS FROM THX, DOLBY, DTS AND SONY CINEMA PRODUCTS

ACT III OPENS 200TH THX SCREEN

According to Lucasfilm Ltd., Act III Theatres has the most THX screens in all of exhibition. With the opening of its Cornelius 9 in Oregon, Act III hit the all-time high of 200 THX screens, which is the largest commitment by any exhibitor worldwide. And Act III isn't stopping there: currently, there are 200 more Act III screens under development within the THX design office. "Act III builds every auditorium in every theatre to the THX standard for one simple reason: it sells tickets," says Randall Blaum, director of advertising and marketing for Act III. Says Monica Dashwood, general manager of the THX division: "From the beginning, Act III believed in the THX philosophy. We are thrilled that our two companies are set to work together for many years to come."

DOLBY SALES TOP 8,200

Sales of Dolby Digital processors have exceeded 8,200 units, in part due to the new Model CP500 digital processor, which Dolby president Bill Jasper calls "one of our fastest-growing products ever." Additionally, more than 200 films have been announced to be released with Dolby Digital soundtracks, bringing the total number of films with Dolby Digital soundtracks to 820. Among these titles will be such high-profile projects as Buena Vista's "Hercules" and "Con Air"; Paramount's "The Saint" and "Titanic"; New Line's "Austin Powers: International Man of Mystery" and "Mortal Kombat 2"; and Warner Bros.' "Murder at 1600" and "Batman and Robin." There are approximately 38,000 Dolby-equipped theatres worldwide.

WARNER TO USE ALL THREE DIGITAL SOUND FORMATS

Having entered into an agreement with Digital Theater Systems, Warner Bros. will release all of its 1997 titles in all three digital sound formats. Previously, Warner had used DTS only on selected releases, in addition to Dolby and SDDS. The deal will apply to all Warner productions and acquisitions.

SONY CINEMA PRODUCTS CORP. OPENS LONDON OFFICE

Sony Cinema Products Corp. has opened a new office in London for the European distribution and service of the Sony Dynamic Digital Sound format. The new London operation replaces the former SCPC office in Frankfurt, Germany, and will handle the expansion of the company's activities in Europe. David Pope has been named operations manager of the London office, and Les Brock has been appointed field service engineer, recorder systems.

UA LOVES A PARADE

Those of you attending ShoWest this year may have been a little mystified if you were walking along the Las Vegas strip only to find yourself surrounded by marching bands, celebrity look-alikes and "Star Wars" characters. It's easily explained: The March 5 opening of United Artists' Showcase 8 Theatre, located in the Showcase retail and entertainment complex next to the MGM Grand Hotel, was celebrated with a parade that made its way throughout the town, headed by the Clark High School Marching Band. Several Vegas resorts welcomed UA by participating in the parade. Celebrity impersonators from the Imperial Palace's "Legends in Concert" were joined by the cast of "Showgirls of Magic" from the San Remo Hotel and Casino. Actors portraying King Kong and Lady Liberty represented the New York-New York Hotel and Casino. "Star Wars" characters Darth Vader, C-3P0 and Boba Fett were on hand at the festivities, as were the caped crusaders Batman and Robin. The Showcase 8—the only first-run movie theatre on the Strip—features eight wall-to-wall screens; DTS, SDDS, Dolby Digital and THX sound technologies; seating with cupholder armrests; and special booster seats for children.

COBB RINGS IN BELL TOWER 20

Cobb Theatres is building an 80,000-square-foot 20-plex, the Bell Tower 20, in Ft. Myers, Florida, scheduled to open this summer. The Bell Tower 20 will offer DTS, Dolby and SDDS sound systems; stadium style seating; and Cobb's luxurious high-back "cozy chairs" with lifting cupholder armrests. Birmingham, Ala.-based Cobb has 600 screens throughout the southeast, and is the largest theatre operator in Florida with 465 screens in 54 locations.

CARDLOGIX GETS SMART

Smart Card manufacturer CardLogix has formed a strategic alliance with MPO Videotronics to jointly provide Smart Cards, software and interactive touchscreen terminals to movie theatres for automatic ticketing. Movie Magic software is provided by Card-Logix free of charge for customization of theatre-specific information. The system is designed to let customers avoid long lines and carry less cash. Customers can obtain tickets with a Movie Gold Card, with deductions made when the card is inserted into a reader located on the terminal. The customer is prompted by a touchscreen to preview movie selections, order tickets and select other purchase options. The items are deducted from the card balance and issued.

Q&A: TURNING JAPANESE: CINEMARK PARTNERS WITH SHOCHIKU

Marking the next step in Cinemark's rapid and aggressive international expansion plans, the U.S.'s fourth-largest circuit has partnered with Shochiku Co. Ltd. to build 100 screens in Japan by the year 2000. The first theatre under the deal, a seven-plex in Kobe, opened March 20, bringing one of the first state-of-the-art multiplexes to the country. Tim Warner, president of Cinemark International, spoke with* BOXOFFICE *about Cinemark's foray into one of the most rapidly-growing markets on the globe.

BOXOFFICE: How did you go about selecting Shochiku as your strategic partner in Japan?

TIM WARNER: I knew [Shochiku president and CEO] Toru Okuyama for a number of years through my involvement with NATO/ShoWest, and was aware of both the quality and status of his company in Japan. I suggested to him when I took my current position as the president of Cinemark International that he might want to consider doing a joint venture, allowing Cinemark International to join the new company he'd formed in Japan, which was Shochiku Multiplex Theatres.

BOXOFFICE: And that is the second largest chain in Japan?

WARNER: They're the second largest exhibition company in Japan, but they're the largest entertainment company in Japan, because they're also in production and distribution.

BOXOFFICE: What will the theatres themselves be called?

WARNER: They'll be called Movix, and we will operate under that trade name. Shochiku has had that name for their drive-in theatres, so the name has been in Japan, linked with the exhibition business, for a number of years.

BOXOFFICE: What will Cinemark/Shochiku, aka Movix, bring to Japan's exhibition scene?

WARNER: The thing we're going to primarily bring is the state-of-the-art multiplex theatre to Japan. Although Warners and UCI have opened multiplexes in Japan, they're not in the major markets. The only multiplex theatre that has currently opened in a major market is AMC.

BOXOFFICE: What are the pertinent statistics that make Japan such an attractive market?

WARNER: Right now, they have something like one screen for every hundred and some thousand people—as compared to the U.S., which is about one screen for every 10,000 people—and yet it's still one of the primary markets outside of the U.S. for U.S. [films], from a dollar standpoint.

BOXOFFICE: Do you have any theories as to why that is?

WARNER: One is the price, because the average ticket price in Japan is much, much higher than the U.S., almost two or three times as high. Also, they enjoy movies very much, and they enjoy American culture. I think as the market develops, the potential of the marketplace is probably one of the best in the entire world.

BOXOFFICE: The real estate in Japan is notoriously expensive and scarce. With AMC, Time Warner and UCI building, how do you plan to secure well-positioned sites?

WARNER: Having our joint venture is going to be an advantage, because we are dealing with a company that has literally done business in Japan for over 103 years. And so we're counting on the fact that they do know the local market and the local developers. And I think that they will bring with them access to the marketplace.

BOXOFFICE: Does the partnership plan to build in other countries?

WARNER: Yes, it is contemplated that Shochiku and Cinemark will consider joint ventures in markets in the Far East, outside of Japan.

BOXOFFICE: What are some other countries that just Cinemark is building in?

WARNER: Just Cinemark, we're in the U.S., Canada, Mexico, Central America, Ecuador, Peru, Chile, Argentina, and Brazil.

BOXOFFICE: What are the challenges and benefits of going into foreign territories?

WARNER: I think the challenge is trying to change our corporate culture and develop into a global exhibition company. And with that comes all the management strains that [that scale of endeavor] puts on an organization. But the potential of the marketplace, or the risk versus rewards, are very high, because most of the markets that we are going in are very, very much underscreened. And as we develop the state-of-the-art cinemas in the marketplaces, we feel that we will achieve results similar to those in markets such as England and Australia and inner Germany, where the market was really underscreened, and exhibitors went in and built, and of course the attendance has doubled and tripled in those marketplaces.

BOXOFFICE: And you want to reproduce those results!

WARNER: We want to reproduce those results around the world!

ANATOMY OF A MERGER

At ShoWest '97, BOXOFFICE is a Witness to History by Ray Greene and Kim Williamson

Putting together the May issue of BOXOFFICE is always an interesting challenge in that its primary purpose is to alert exhibition to the golden networking opportunity presented each year by the ShowCanada convention, while its secondary theme is to wrap up various types of unfinished business related to ShoWest, ShowCanada's unaffiliated but nonetheless significant cousin to the south.

While most publications which cover ShoWest tend to focus on such benchmarks of that annual show as the studio-sponsored dining events, the vast exhibition-related trade show and the star-studded final night awards event, many stories that may have even more lasting impact on global exhibition occur in the margins of the official show schedule, where private meetings and business discussions occur every minute of each show day. With that in mind, BOXOFFICE editors Ray Greene and Kim Williamson determined that they would keep their eyes open at ShoWest '97 for a single story that could be given extra play in the pages of BOXOFFICE, both as a way of getting important first-hand news to our audience and in order to find a symbol for the hundreds of other bits of significant industry business which occur out of the limelight at ShoWest each year.

On the final day of ShoWest, in a nondescript restaurant off the lobby of Bally's, our two intrepid editors found what they were looking for when they were witnesses to a piece of exhibition history as Decatron's legendary managing director Joost Bert and A.J. "Ad" Weststrate of Holland's Cinema Groep executed the final contracts for a unique partnership. The Cinema Groep/Decatron compact will combine Decatron's vast experience with Cinema Groep's deep understanding of the Dutch marketplace in an alliance that just might mark a new beginning for the way the people of Holland go to the movies. The first build will be called the Palais de Cinema Alhambra, and it will house eight state-of-the-art theatres in the Dutch town of Vlissingen. And the contracts launching this new team on the Dutch scene were signed right before BOXOFFICE's bulging eyes.

HISTORY IN THE MAKING: A.J. Weststrate talks to BOXOFFICE at ShoWest.

And so, on these pages, Kim and Ray bring you eyewitness interviews for a breaking piece of international exhibition news. Like the song says, this could be the start of something big. And we were there, so you didn't have to be.

BOXOFFICE: I understand you have an interesting announcement to make.

A.J. WESTSTRATE: Well, it's a quite big announcement for Holland. As you know, there's a very successful Belgian company called Decatron, run by the Berts. They're very successful in Belgium and in France already, and now we've made up a joint venture to open our first cinema in Holland. Construction will be starting in a few months and will finish toward the end of this year.

BOXOFFICE: How many screens?

WESTSTRATE: There are going to be eight screens with about 1,500 seats.

BOXOFFICE: Located?

WESTSTRATE: In the south of Holland, in Vlissingen [English name: Flushing], in the province of Zeeland. And the cinema there now has only 500 seats, so it's going to be three times as big.

BOXOFFICE: A Dutch exhibitor once said to us that The Netherlands didn't need multiplexes, that there were enough screens and nothing needed to change. Why do you think this development will better serve the moviegoing public?

WESTSTRATE: You only need look at the enormous success that the Berts have already had. And there's nothing in Holland that's that same way. This is going to be the first one built with their formula. So if it's a success elsewhere in the world, why not in Holland? I think [exhibitors] are waiting too long [to multiplex the country], and there's too little competition in Holland.

BOXOFFICE: Do you envision there will be more theatres in Holland from this joint venture?

WESTSTRATE: Well, we're going to look to see what the market is, and when there are good sites we're going to try, of course.

JOOST BERT: I think, together with Ad as a partner, we will be aggressive in the Dutch market. We are now working on some sites that we can't discuss for the moment. But as soon as everything is secured we will announce them. As a Flemish family, working together with Ad, we are very thrilled. We know we are doing the right thing for the Dutch market. We have found somebody in Holland who is on the same frequency, who has the same ideas of quality—who's willing to go to the extremes in providing comfort, who's willing to go to the extremes in what people are asking for.

If some guy from Holland said that about theatres, that's not true. The need for comfort is a universal feeling everywhere. People appreciate leg space, appreciate a big screen, appreciate state-of-the-art presentation. And that's what we're going to do. I'm quite surprised to find someone like Ad, who really starts with what's going to be a big investment—we're talking between 9 million and 10 million Dutch guilders—a very big investment for that part of the country. And I'm quite sure that we will be very successful with that theatre. And from this theatre we will start on—Ad, how many other projects?

WESTSTRATE: About 10 projects in total, and hopefully we'll be a big market player in a few years over in Holland.

BOXOFFICE: Do you have an estimate of the total number of screens your joint venture will have at build-out?

WESTSTRATE: About 100, 120.

BERT [laughing]: It's nice to hear that, Ad! The more the merrier.

BOXOFFICE: In one of the seminars on ShoWest's international day, they talked about how the megaplexing phenomenon doesn't necessarily work in the European market. Do you agree with that statement?

BERT: I think that multiplexing and megaplexing will work in Holland. Eventually, it will come. Whether it will be us or somebody else, multiplexing and megaplexing are coming to Holland. We are not the first in Holland with a multiplex—Pathe, the French company that took over Cannon/MGM, is already successful with its cinema in downtown Rotterdam. So that proves that the formula of multiplexing works.

BOXOFFICE: What are the parameters about this particular build that add up to success? How does it fulfill the formula that you need to have a successful multiplex in a place like The Netherlands?

BERT: It's extremely—I won't say "difficult," that's not the word—but where we start with is Ad, it's in his hometown. It's a small town. The catchment area is very small. And in the town of Vlissingen, how many inhabitants do you have?

WESTSTRATE: A hundred thousand.

BERT: Well, it will draw. It will draw at least in an area of 50 to 60 kilometers. I think it may take away some business from [Decatron's theatre in] Antwerp. We have so many Dutch people traveling for one hour coming from cities like Utrecht, all the way down to Antwerp. So in some ways we will lose some patrons, maybe, to the new cinema.

BOXOFFICE: (laughter) But better to lose it to yourself than to some other guy.

BERT: But I'm very much thrilled that we've found Ad, who's thinking the same way, who's "crazy" enough to invest... Ad is the first one to do this. So we're going to do it better than Pathe, we're going to do it better than anybody else, any other players in the Dutch market.

SIGNED, SEALED, DELIVERED: Cinema Groep's Weststrate and Joost Bert shake hands after executing the contracts for their historic joint venture.

BOXOFFICE: What effect will this have on the Dutch film industry?

WESTSTRATE: There is a big strategy plan already, building toward the year 2000. At this moment in Holland, people [on average] go only once a year to the cinema. In four years time, we want to double that—so we've got to go to 25 million to 30 million yearly admissions in the year 2000.

BOXOFFICE: In some quarters in Europe—specifically in France—naysayers insist that multiplexes will provide more screens only for more Hollywood movies, not the local films.

BERT: I disagree 100 percent. The fact that we have more theatres in France means that the boxoffice attendance goes up. We don't take away from other people. It gives more opportunities for local producers to start making product again. I made a bet with a guy from Buena Vista, saying that the Dutch market has the potential to go back to 35 million on a yearly basis, and when that happens, the local people will have the opportunity to start again making very successful Dutch movies. Same thing for France: If the cinema attendance in France doubles, it will also double the number of people coming to French films.

BOXOFFICE: Is this also a plus for the suppliers, the folks who provide the sound equipment, the concessions?

WESTSTRATE: It's a plus for everybody in the industry. And as for local films, [at Cinema Groep] we always reserve screens especially for European films. That's all they show. So hopefully this will mean there will be more screens [for homegrown product].

BOXOFFICE: What again is the projected cost for this first site?

BERT: Between 9 million and 10 million Dutch guilders. And who will be the winners? The profession itself, and the patrons, the customers.

BOXOFFICE: Is this a 50/50 venture, or is there a different partnership split?

BERT: Let's say I don't want to answer this. We will build it—it will be the same standards and it will be a partnership between the two families doing it. There are two parts: On the one hand, I'm supplying know-how, and I'm Decatron; on the other hand, I'm the family Bert, going in joint venture with the family Weststrate.

WESTSTRATE: We're going in as big friends.

BOXOFFICE: I don't expect you can name the Dutch towns you're thinking of for your next sites, but could you characterize them as urban areas where perhaps there are already small theatre sites, or will it be more rural places where there aren't screens already?

BERT: I think if we give that information we will already have said too much.

WESTSTRATE: It's a very small country, Holland. A very small country.

BOXOFFICE: Do either of you have any final comments?

BERT: The partnership we sign now with Ad, we did exactly the same thing last year with some people from Luxembourg. Their theatre opened last year on the 18th of December, it's a 10-plex, and it's a very successful theatre. You know, Luxembourg has only 360,000 inhabitants, and also over there the partnership works wonderfully, attendance is up, patrons are pleased, the distribution companies are very pleased with what we're doing over there. So I'm sure this will be exactly the same thing in Holland.

BOXOFFICE: Is there any chance Decatron is ever going to come to America?

[Bert offers a wide, "wouldn't-you-like-to-know" smile, and is silent for a very long time. All laugh.]

BOXOFFICE: (laughing) We're going to have to describe that smile. (to Weststrate) Do you have a final comment?

WESTSTRATE: I'm hoping that this is the start of a very successful operation, and I think this is the smallest, with eight, where we started. But the other ones may become very much bigger. We hope to tell you more then.

INTERNATIONAL NEWS BRIEFS

PACIFIC OVERTURES

NOTES FROM THE PACIFIC RIM by Susan Lambert

LEAD STORY: JUDGEMENT DAY IN SOUTH KOREA FOR U.S.DISTRIBS

SEOUL—Columbia TriStar, 20th Century Fox, United Intl. Pictures (UIP), Warner Bros. and Buena Vista were all found guilty of anticompetitive practices by the Korean Fair Trade Commission. A KFTC official, Im Young-jun, issued a warning to the Seoul branches of the top five U.S. film distributors. The officials admitted their wrongdoing and were granted leniency. If convicted again, each would be subject to a fine or ordered to shut down its South Korean branch offices.

South Korea has become one of the top ten foreign markets for United States product since UIP pioneered direct distribution in 1988, amid much protest from local companies. The anticompetitive practices involved the withholding of ads from two Seoul-based newspapers which U.S. companies withdrew from because they felt they were paying 30 percent more than locals were for ads. Local independent distributors, including Hana Media and Kwak Kyung-hee claimed that was not true. The U.S. companies were paying for ad agency services and missed cost-saving measures implemented by the locals who are equally frustrated by the high prices of movie ad rates.

Meanwhile, more U.S. companies are looking to get in on the lucrative South Korean market. Polygram Filmed Entertainment and Paramount Pictures are in talks about a three-year, co-financing joint venture to distribute 10-12 big budget Hollywood films per year in the country. The deal may involve a third-party South Korean company, and Paramount is in discussion with several major players about a possible arrangement. Many Seoul-based distributors are interested in working with the U.S. companies, but may be leery since they feel they have been burned before with deals that involved high price films which did not perform well.

SATOSHI ISEKI HEADS UP HERALD

TOKYO—Satoshi Iseki, the head of NDF, a production financing company, has taken over as head of the international department at Nippon Herald, an independent distributor. Iseki left Nippon Herald 12 years ago and will now also serve on their board of directors. He will be in charge of acquisitions and financing for Herald, which owns a 10 percent stake in NDF, where Iseki will continue to run operations. NDF has 10 films in production, including Chen Kaige's "Assassins," a thriller about a plot to assassinate Shih-Huang-Ti of the Ch'in Dynasty. Based on the book "Shiji," "Assassins" is considered to be the most expensive movie ever made in Asia with a budget of US$30 million.

AUSTRALIA MERGES FILM AGENCIES

SYDNEY—The state government of Queensland will merge its two principal film agencies into one. Film Queensland, a state-based project and talent development agency, will join with the Pacific Film and Television Commission (PFTC). The PFTC is noted for its aggressive marketing campaign to bring offshore productions to Queensland for location filming. Arts Minister Joan Sheldon said the restructure will "refocus" funding away from corporate services and administration to more "front line services," such as arts organizations and producers.

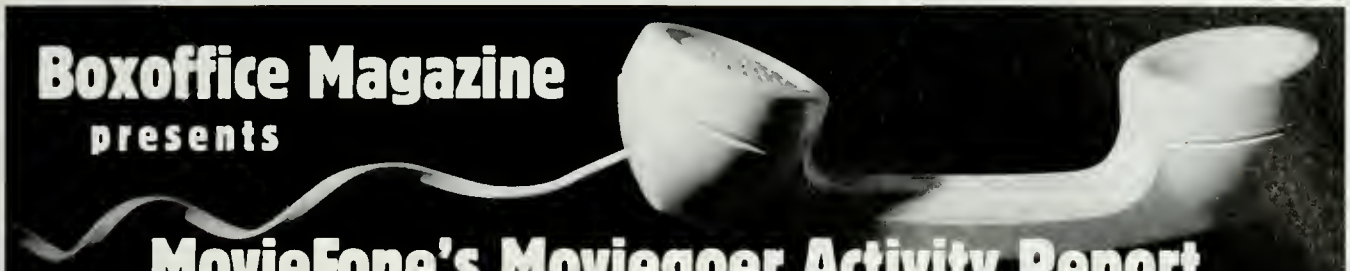
In other news, Australian animation and production company Energee Entertainment won the movie and merchandising rights to the classic Queensland book "The Magic Pudding." Energee, which beat out such contenders as Disney and Jim Hensen Productions, plans to turn the children's book, about a pudding that can be eaten forever, into an animated feature. The book, written by the late Norman Lindsay, will be adapted by children's writer Morris Gleitzman.

KIWI COMMISSION NAMES HARLEY

AUCKLAND—Dr. Ruth Harley OBE, former chief executive of the television funding body, New Zealand On Air, was named to head New Zealand's Film Commission. Harley is also a former national media director of the Saatchi and Saatchi ad agency. The Commission helps promote a strong New Zealand voice in film.

SHOCHIKU AND CINEMARK MAKE MOVIX

KOBE—On March 20th, Shochiku Co., Ltd. and Cinemark International Inc. opened their first joint venture multiplex theatre in Kobe, Japan. The state-of-the-art seven-plex features stadium seating, oversized screens, THX and digital sound. Next up will be a twelve-screen theatre in Kyoto. Shochiku and Cinemark share equivalent ownership of a 53 percent interest in Shochiku Cinemark Theatres (SCT), which will operate under the trade name Movix. The remaining 47 percent is owned by a consortium of prominent Japanese companies including Orix Corp., Taisei Corp., Obayashi Corp., Shimizu Corp., Nishimatsu Corp., Toda Corp., Mitsui & Co. and Lotte Co.



Shochiku is a leading distributor, exhibitor and producer of movies. It currently owns and operates over 200 screens, making it the second largest movie exhibitor in Japan. Cinemark is the fourth largest movie exhibitor in the world with 1,525 screens in the United States, Canada, Mexico and Chile. Toru Okuyama, president and chief executive officer of Shochiku stated that merging the resources of the two companies makes great business sense. "Our expertise and knowledge of the Japanese marketplace combined with one of the fastest growing global exhibition companies will make SCT a leader in the Japanese exhibition market." For more on Movix, see our interview with Cinemark International president, Tim Warner, pg. 69.

WARNER MYCAL BREAKS NEW GROUND

TOKYO—Warner Mycal Cinemas, a joint venture between the Japanese supermarket chain Nichii and Warner Bros. and the first circuit to build a multiplex in Japan, plans to open 39 new screens at five more sites this year. That would bring Warner Mycal Cinema's screen total to 96. Despite an overall 7.5 percent drop at the Japanese boxoffice last year, Warner Mycal's admissions were up 15 percent indicating its strategy of building sites in suburbs and small urban areas may well prove to be a success. The five new sites include a nine-screen, 2,124 seat build in the Shinyurigaoka Vivre department store outside Tokyo, a free standing multiplex in Niigata and retail-merged outlets in Hiroshima, Hokkaido and Hyogo Prefecture.

Compiled by BOXOFFICE MAGAZINE. Numbers for Boxoffice Gross represent total domestic boxoffice grosses to the nearest $100,000; + signs indicate that films remain in theatrical release. Number of Screens indicates the maximum number of screens in widest, simultaneous release. Entries in the Theatrical/Video Distributor column list two names when the video releasing company is different from (or releases through a subsidiary different from) the theatrical distributor. Exact day-and-date specific entries for Home Video Release are confirmed; in all other cases, the month indicated for a release is forecast by the editors of BOXOFFICE. BOXOFFICE is not liable for errors or omissions in the chart.

The Big Picture

One of the less publicized of the annual events that swirl around each year's Oscar ceremonies is the nominees luncheon. It's a quaint custom—a bringing together of all the nominated actors, technicians and artisans from across any given year's Academy Awards spectrum—and one Oscar event that may even embody a deeper truth about the movies than the ultimate outcome of the Oscar race itself.

Take a good look at the photo printed on this page. Only a few of the faces it contains will be familiar to you. If you squint, you can spot Billy Bob Thornton, James Woods, Kristin Scott Thomas, a handful of recognizable others. "English Patient" co-producer Saul Zaentz is that bearded gent in the top row, eight spaces in from the left. Brenda Blethyn of "Secrets and Lies" is in the second full row from the bottom, eight spaces in from the right. To get to her, you just passed by Blethyn's director Mike Leigh and "Ghosts of Mississippi" supporting actor nominee James Woods—did you spot them? There are so many faces in this image that it's almost impossible to reproduce them in an easily viewable form. And many of the most famous 1997 nominees weren't even able to attend: Indie film fixtures (and "Fargo" creators) the Coen Brothers appear to have stayed in New York, no doubt kept at home by the complexities of getting their latest black comedy, "The Big Lebowski," up and running; "Jerry Maguire" star Tom Cruise was busy making his London-based Stanley Kubrick film "Eyes Wide Shut" opposite wife Nicole Kidman; and "Shine" star Geoffrey Rush, well, he still lives in Australia, which is a hell of a long way to come for a free lunch.

Getting eyestrain over looking for famous profiles in this shot is really beside the point. It's the very anonymity of the majority of these faces that speaks volumes about the nature of a medium which is so often discussed in terms only of "name" actors and directors, but which in fact remains the most complex of collaborative arts. A typical studio-produced movie employs literally hundreds, from the people who lay and tape down the electrical cables to the hair and make-up artists to accountants (who some believe may have the most creative job of all) to the guys who drive the catering trucks.

Not everyone's work shows up on the screen, and not everyone's function is illustrious enough to warrant Oscar recognition. But the teamwork required to pull off even an *un*successful movie is perhaps the most fundamental attribute of filmmaking, and though almost every film is inevitably run according to hierarchical management principles, each player in the behind-the-scenes drama performs an integral part. And the irony is, if everyone does his or her job correctly, most will remain invisible, since even the most fantastical movie creation seeks in some way to present an utterly believable and decipherable world.

So look at these faces. For some, like this year's "Cinderella," Billy Bob Thornton, a 1996 Oscar nomination is undoubtedly the beginning of bigger things. Others may have peaked right here within this image without knowing it. One or two of these faces may even be capping off careers that stretch back decades, and which may comprise anything from years of steady, self-effacing craftsmanship to long periods of struggle and hardship and waiting for a lucky break that finally came at last.

The whole world loves a horserace in one form or another, and the Oscars, through no fault of their own, are often depicted as the ultimate competition. Something like a billion people are watching each and every year, and millions of dollars are riding on the outcome—not just in the form of the ubiquitous office betting pool, but in terms of raised salaries and bigger budgets for the winners, and increased top-dollar earning longevity for the nominees. By the time the dust clears, few aside from the participants remember the nominees' lunch.

But still, there's a truth buried in this quaint, old-fashioned custom of bringing together an improvised mutual admiration society comprised of the women and men who, for this year, have ridden that Hollywood hobby horse to within sight of the big brass ring. The law of averages being what it is, most of the people standing here had to know that in all likelihood they would not take home a 1996 Oscar. But something in their eyes and smiles seems to say that's O.K., that it can be lived with as they head back to their normal professional lives. Excellence is, of course, to be cultivated and celebrated and afforded the highest accolades and most lasting honors. But there's still a lot to be said for the honorable nature of an honest day's work.—Ray Greene

OPENING CREDITS

Thanks to the delightful but very busy period ushered in by the ShoWest convention, a bit of business we meant to share with you last month fell by the wayside. Those of you who've been reading us regularly since June of 1994 already know all about our website BOXOFFICE ONLINE. The very first and, to our minds, still the most complete website launched by any film trade publication, BOXOFFICE ONLINE was dramatically revamped and "relaunched" in March 1996. The "new and improved" BOXOFFICE ONLINE is an astonishing success story. In its first year of operations, it has already reached well over 500,000 discrete, individual users, logging many millions of "hits" and receiving multiple awards in the process.

The big surprise, though, came a few months back, when, right in the middle of the ShoWest editorial crunch, we were informed by our website design team at Marlin Software that THE NET, a leading, nationally distributed print magazine dedicated to trends on the internet, had analyzed thousands of websites in order to compile a list of "THE TOP 100 WEBSITES OF ALL TIME." Despite the proliferation of movie-themed info sites on the web, only four film-related websites made the final, 100 Website cut.

And guess who came in at number one.

We point this out to you partly to crow about something we're proud of, but also for a more important reason. Unlike many of the other awards BOXOFFICE ONLINE has grabbed in the past year, THE NET's considered opinion of our editorial content demonstrated not only a shrewd and intelligent analysis of BOXOFFICE ONLINE's underlying aesthetic, but an outsider's appreciation of a sampling of the kinds of materials we struggle to bring to our readership each and every month. We know from the letters and calls we receive from our readers how much BOXOFFICE means to you, and we're deeply grateful. It was nice to get some additional validation from a prestigious and impartial third party—one which nevertheless seems to have recognized some important points about the relationship between BOXOFFICE and its loyal audience.

So here, in full and verbatim, is what THE NET had to say in the review which accompanied its naming of BOXOFFICE ONLINE as the single best film content provider on the World Wide Web:

What's the most we can hope for from most film sites? A few tired reviews as impartial as a press kit, a couple of hackneyed 'star' profiles, maybe some sound bites or a few stills. Well, BOXOFFICE, the online version of a magazine that's been around for 75-plus years, goes well beyond those expectations. It delivers the densest collection of intelligent film writing on the Web, with readable interviews of film personalities and timely scoops on soon-to-be-released movies. Surfers who spend some time here will no doubt come away with a long list for the corner video rental.

"The site has three searchable indexes. This Just In is updated every Friday, and offers previews of upcoming films, as well as reviews of all current releases (and I do mean all). The Classic Review Archive includes reviews dating back to 1931. Finally, there's an archive for just the last year. The range is impressive; scrolling the list of 400 reviews in the '95-'96 archive can overwhelm even the most avid moviegoer.

"A trip to the BOXOFFICE Classic Archives is a study in film history. Reviewing 'Frankenstein' (1931), a correspondent wrote, 'It is one of those weird and gruesome stories that brings shrieks and ejaculations from the feminine fans.' In those days, BOXOFFICE included a 'Selling Seats' footnote to reviews, providing helpful promoting tips to theatre owners: 'Use large cut-outs of "The Monster" in the lobby. Arouse public curiosity by stating: "To have seen 'Frankenstein' is to wear a badge of courage."'

"An industry guide as much as a filmgoer's resource, BOXOFFICE ONLINE keeps the sensationalism to a minimum. Features run the gamut from actor profiles to regional updates of filmmaking internationally, from analyses of key directors to industry insider production notes. Also worth browsing are the extensive industry links to everything from popcorn popper distributors to the big Hollywood studios. It's a great read and a great resource for film buffs: intelligent, useful and on top of things, all at the same time."

> "BOXOFFICE ONLINE keeps the sensationalism to a minimum, delivering the densest collection of intelligent film writing on the Web. It's a great read and a great resource for film buffs: intelligent, useful and on top of things, all at the same time."
> —from* "The 100 Best Websites of All Time," *The NET Magazine

As you can imagine, we were pretty excited about a write-up like that. We disagree only with that reference to "the corner video rental," for an important reason: Though it might increase consumer traffic, we have intentionally organized the materials BOXOFFICE ONLINE contains without the slightest reference to video release dates. BOXOFFICE ONLINE, like BOXOFFICE itself, is dedicated to the art of the theatrically exhibited feature film, and nothing else.

One last piece of unfinished business has to do with the 1997 Academy Awards. As you may have figured out from our May '97 Oscar coverage, BOXOFFICE was once again backstage at the ceremony this year. You may also remember that we had a few choice words in these pages for the Academy's 1996 decision to deny BOXOFFICE Academy credentials for the first time in this magazine's long history. For the record, the Academy treated BOXOFFICE with great promptness and courtesy in 1997, and so we now consider the issue closed. We couldn't let that sought-for outcome pass, however, without remarking on the great outpouring of love and affection so many of you demonstrated by contacting the Academy on our behalf after last year's misunderstanding.

As we said in our June '96 Oscar editorial, we feel it's our job to be there because we are fortunate enough to act as exhibition's journalistic voice to the powers that be. Your actions on our behalf proved that point in the most powerful way possible. And not incidentally, touched all of us deeply in the process.

Until next time,

REVIEW DIGEST

Our monthly release overview 57

. . . Your callers through your telephone answering machine

When a patron calls your theatre he generally knows what he wants to see. He may have listen to 5 minutes of messages, direction, senior citizens specials, and what is playing in each auditorium before he gets what he is looking for ... What times does the show start! The new SMART Citi-Tell system cuts directly to the information the caller wants with an interactive touch tone command. You can hear the show times again, go to the main menu hear alternate movie choices, or even get film reviews of the movie. It's similar to a voice mail system, but without the computer and hard disk that can CRASH. The Citi-Tell uses advanced FLASH memory that will not accidentally be erased and you can change any pa of the message without recording the whole thing over. It can even be programmed with new shows and messages from a remote professional voice service from thousands of mil away.

This exciting new product allows you to handle many more calls with fewer phone lines. expandable structure can handle 40 or more lines by adding the appropriate modules or additional controllers. The package can be used on-premises in a single multiplex, or hand all the calls for all your screens in a small city.

This digital message server provides the clearest sound quality of any machine. The Citi-Te has the highest throughput capability because selecting a message from the message "tree is instantaneous.

When your patron calls and continues to get busy signals, he may call your competitor! T system could pay for itself in no time with added business.

The Citi-Tell system is a stand-alone on-premises digital message server. The basic system is furnished with 2 phone line capability. Adding each new plug-in line card increases the line capability by 2 more lines to a maximum of 8 lines. Additional Citi-Tell servers connect together for more lines and more memory capability. Message editing is transferred to all servers in the system.

HOLLYWOOD UPDATES

Walt Disney Studios and Pixar Animation Studios have agreed to jointly produce five movies over the next 10 years. The two companies first teamed on the smash hit "Toy Story," which brought computer animation to the next level with its strikingly detailed 3-D appearance. Disney and Pixar will be equal partners on the five pictures and related products, including home videos, merchandise and interactive media products. A feature called "Bugs" will be the first picture under the deal, due out Christmas 1998.

Al Pacino and his production company, Chal Prods., have signed a first-look deal with Castle Rock Entertainment. Pacino starred in Castle Rock's "City Hall" and will star in the company's upcoming remake of "The Cincinnati Kid."

Oscar-winning writer Michael Blake ("Dances With Wolves") and his partner, writer/director/producer William Morgan, have announced the formation of a new independent film company, Last Stand Pictures, which will output three to five films a year. The first project for the company will be an adaptation of the Douglas C. Jones novel "Winding Stair," a courtroom thriller set on an Indian reservation in the 1890s. Blake will script the adaptation.

"Scream" scripter Kevin Williamson has pacted with Miramax to write two sequels to the satiric horror film (which has grossed more than $86 million to date) for Dimension, Miramax's horror genre banner. The film will reunite stars Neve Campbell and Liev Schreiber and director Wes Craven. Craven signed on as part of his new three-film deal with Miramax and Dimension. Williamson will also write a treatment for the next "Halloween" slasher flick, due for an October 1998 release.

Filmmaker Spike Lee ("Get On the Bus") has signed a three-year, first-look deal with Columbia Pictures. Under the deal, Lee will write, direct and produce films for the studio. He'll also be setting up an office on Columbia's Culver City, Calif. lot, in addition to his offices in New York, which house his production company, 40 Acres and a Mule Filmworks.

Scripter Zak Penn, who helped develop the story for the upcoming animated comedy "Ants" for DreamWorks, has signed an exclusive two-year, first-look deal with the studio. DreamWorks is currently developing his script "Fish Out of Water," another animated feature. Penn has also penned "Last Action Hero" and "P.C.U."

Disney-based Jerry Bruckheimer Films has made a deal with Mike Sager, a writer for GQ, The Washington Post, and Rolling Stone, among other publications. Bruckheimer and Disney's Touchstone recently optioned Sager's "The Martyrdom of Veronica Guerin," an article he wrote for GQ about an Irish journalist killed last summer. Under the deal, Bruckheimer will get first look at Sager's articles, and he'll suggest ideas to the scribe.

"The Adventures of Pinocchio" helmer Steve Barron has signed a two-year, first-look deal with Jim Henson Productions to develop family-oriented feature film and television projects. Barron's other credits include "Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles" and "The Coneheads"; he also produced "While You Were Sleeping" and "The Specialist."

Under a new alliance between Merchant Ivory Prods. and Capitol Films, the team of writer-director James Ivory and producer Ismail Merchant will make films to be co-financed by the two companies. The first project under the deal will be the drama "A Soldier's Daughter Never Cries," which will star Nick Nolte (who starred in Merchant Ivory's "Jefferson in Paris"). Merchant Ivory's most recent production was "Surviving Picasso." Their alliance with the Walt Disney Co., forged in 1992, will end with the upcoming Bruce Beresford ("Paradise Road")-helmed "The Playmaker."

Phoenix Pictures has entered an agreement with Pioneer LDC, the entertainment division of the Japanese company Pioneer Electronic Corp., giving Pioneer exclusive distribution rights in Japan to nine of Phoenix's films over the next 15 years. Under a deal Phoenix made with Sony in 1995, Sony distributes all Phoenix films worldwide except for Japan. The first film under the Phoenix/Pioneer pact will be "Amy Foster," based on Joseph Conrad's classic romance novel, followed by Oliver Stone's Sean Penn starrer "U-Turn."

Actor/writer/director Ben Stiller ("The Cable Guy") has signed an exclusive two-year, first-look deal to write, direct and produce films for Fox 2000. Stiller made his directing debut with 1994's "Reality Bites," and he recently starred in the well-received "Flirting With Disaster." He's currently scripting for Warner Bros. an adaptation of the Budd Schulberg novel "What Makes Sammy Run," which he may also star in and direct.

Paramount Pictures and Polygram Filmed Entertainment are negotiating a three-year co-financing deal for 10 to 12 big-budget films. Under the terms of the agreement, whichever company originates a project will get domestic distribution rights, with the other taking foreign rights. Paramount and Polygram have teamed before on the Holly Hunter comedy "Home for the Holidays"; the recent horror thriller "The Relic"; and the upcoming Christian Slater starrer "The Flood," with Paramount distributing domestically and Polygram internationally.

DreamWorks will be opening an office in New York to handle East Coast distribution and marketing. The studio has signed a 10-year lease with Hiro Real Estate Co. for the 22nd floor of 650 Madison Ave. The new office will house a staff of 10.

HOLLYWOOD REPORT

DANIEL DAY-LEWIS

"Boxer" Heavyweight

TEA LEONI

Makes "Impact"

STANLEY TUCCI

"Ship" Shape

"THE BOXER" Daniel Day-Lewis ("The Crucible") will reunite with "My Left Foot" and "In the Name of the Father" helmer Jim Sheridan in this drama about a professional pugilist who returns to the ring after completing a 13-year jail sentence. He also seeks out his former lover, who has been raising her teenage son by herself. Emily Watson, hot off her Best Actress nomination for "Breaking the Waves," co-stars. (Universal)

"MUSIC FROM ANOTHER ROOM" Brenda Blethyn (recently nominated for Best Actress for "Secrets & Lies"), Jude Law ("Shopping"), Jennifer Tilly ("Bound"), Martha Plimpton ("I Shot Andy Warhol"), Jon Tenney ("Fools Rush In"), Jeremy Piven ("Grosse Pointe Blank") and Gretchen Mol star in this film about a man (Law) who's searching for his true love (Mol)—a woman whose birth he assisted when he was five years old. Charlie Peters ("Passed Away") directs and scripts. (Orion)

"THE ODD COUPLE 2" Walter Matthau and Jack Lemmon, who starred as Oscar Madison and Felix Unger in the 1968 bigscreen "Odd Couple," will reunite for a sequel in which Felix's son and Oscar's daughter get married. The soon-to-be in-laws must tolerate each other again as they drive to the desert, where the ceremony is to take place. Howard Deutch, who directed the duo in "Grumpy Old Men," will helm. Neil Simon, who wrote the original, will script. (Paramount)

"THE RED VIOLIN" Samuel L. Jackson ("A Time to Kill") and Greta Scacchi ("Jefferson in Paris") are set to star in this film that centers around a red violin, which is passed from person to person over the course of 400 years. Francois Girard ("Thirty-Two Short Films About Glenn Gould") will helm and co-wrote the script with Don McKellar. (New Line)

"OUT OF SIGHT" This adaptation of "Get Shorty" author Elmore Leonard's best-selling novel will star "Batman and Robin's" George Clooney, who will play a charming bank robber who escapes from prison and takes a female federal marshal hostage. Complications arise when the two fall in love. Steven Soderbergh ("sex, lies and videotape") will direct. (Universal)

"ARIGO" A journalist ("Grosse Pointe Blank's" John Cusack) is sent to Brazil to cover the trial of Arigo, a man being tried for witchcraft, in this drama, which is based on a true story. Alan Arkin, who co-starred in "Grosse Pointe Blank," will take a supporting role and will also direct. (Distribution is to be set)

"DEEP IMPACT" This sci-fi thriller, to be directed by Mimi Leder ("The Peacemaker"), executive produced by Steven Spielberg and scripted by Michael Tolkin ("The Player") and Bruce Joel Rubin, is inspired by the film "When Worlds Collide" and Arthur C. Clarke's book "The Hammer of God." Following the disaster film trend, it's about a comet on a deadly collision course with Earth. Endangered are Tea Leoni ("Flirting With Disaster") and Elijah Wood ("The Ice Storm"), along with the rest of the human race. (Paramount)

"PALMETTO" Woody Harrelson ("The People vs. Larry Flynt") and Elisabeth Shue ("The Saint") will star in this mystery crime thriller, which is based on James Hadley Chase's novel "Just Another Sucker," about a good guy who tries to go bad. Michael Rapaport ("Metro"), Angela Featherstone ("Con Air"), Chloe Sevigny ("Kids") and Tom Wright ("Gridlock'd") will co-star. Volker Schlondorff ("The Ogre") will helm. (Distribution is to be set)

"WRONGFULLY ACCUSED" Continuing his legacy of starring roles in action genre spoofs, Leslie Nielsen ("Spy Hard," "Naked Gun") will head the cast of another parody film, this time a send-up of "The Fugitive." Pat Proft, scripter of the "Naked Gun" and "Hot Shots!" films, will make his directorial debut on the comedy, in which Nielsen plays a man accused of murdering a wealthy porta-potty tycoon. Meanwhile, the real killer, a one-armed, one-legged man, escapes. (Warner)

"WISHMASTER" The stars of three '80s horror classics—Robert Englund (Freddy Krueger of "Nightmare on Elm Street"), Kane Hodder (Jason of "Friday the 13th") and Tony Todd (Candyman of "Candyman")—will appear in this Peter Atkins ("Hellraiser")-scripted film about an evil force called the Djinn, which grants people's secret desires in exchange for their souls. Robert Kurtzman ("The Demolitionist") will helm. (LIVE)

"SHIP OF FOOLS" Stanley Tucci ("Big Night") will write, direct and star in this comedy, which is about two actors in the 1930s who mistakenly stow away on a boat. The project will reunite fellow "Big Night" cast members Tony Shalhoub, Isabella Rossellini and Campbell Scott. Oliver Platt ("Funny Bones") also co-stars. (Fox Searchlight)

"GOOD WILL HUNTING" Robin Williams ("Father's Day") will play a therapist who tries to help a troubled young prodigy from the wrong side of the tracks live up to his potential. Matt Damon ("Courage Under Fire") and Ben Affleck ("Chasing Amy") will co-star, and also co-wrote the script. Minnie Driver ("Grosse Pointe Blank") has also signed on. Gus Van Sant ("To Die For") will helm. (Miramax)

"THE SPARROW" Antonio Banderas ("Evita") will play a Jesuit priest leading a secret mission to outer space in this film, which is based on Mary Dorias Russell's best-selling novel. Geoffrey Wright ("Romper Stomper") will direct. (Distribution is to be set)

"SPECIES 2" The space creature supermodel who gave new meaning to the phrase "tough love" in 1995's "Species" is back for more in this sequel. Natasha Henstridge returns as Sil, the human/alien hybrid obsessed with breeding—to the fatal misfortune of the mates she selects. Peter Medak ("Romeo Is Bleeding") helms. (MGM)

ET CETERA: The 18th film in UA's James Bond franchise has been titled "Tomorrow Never Dies." In the film, Bond (Pierce Brosnan) must stop a villainous media mogul (Jonathan Pryce) who manufactures news to change the outcomes of vital world events. Michelle Yeoh plays Bond's ally...Kristin Scott Thomas will star opposite Robert Redford in Buena Vista's "The Horse Whisperer," in which a woman becomes entwined with a horse tamer after her daughter ("Home Alone 3's" Scarlett Johansson) is severely injured in a riding accident ...Parker Posey will take the title role in "The Misadventures of Margaret," to which Janeane Garofalo was previously attached...Hugo Weaving ("The Adventures of Priscilla, Queen of the Desert") will star in "The Interview," a thriller in which a man plays cat-and-mouse with two interrogators.

JULIA ROBERTS on Fame, Fortune, Woody, Mel, and Making It to "MY BEST FRIEND'S WEDDING" by Ray Greene

The shriek of schoolgirl pleasure resounding through the open door of an editing room on the Sony Pictures lot is loud, full-throated, even musical. The popular (and often all too true) assumption is that filmmaking is an arduous process—as painful in its own way as giving birth is said to be, with perhaps even more opportunities for something critical to go wrong. But the work-in-progress threading its way through a flatbed editing machine in the next room must be different. From the sound of things, somebody watching those freshly-assembled images on that dimly-illuminated screen must be having the time of her life.

That someone is, of all people, Julia Roberts—superstar, accomplished actress, and national fetish object. After some jovial goodbyes and a few giddy compliments to the editing team, she hurries into the hall, that quicksilver smile playing across her lips, her moist eyes still creased with laughter. "Oh! Nice to meet you!" she says, her hand extending gracefully. "Would you mind if we did this in my car? There's a yarn store I want to get over to if it's still open! Give me a second, I just have to make the call."

In a blur of movement, Roberts disappears, her blonde, female assistant chasing at her heels like a well-trained housepet. A moment passes, just long enough to contemplate the earth-shattering news possibilities in the revelation that Julia Roberts is a closet...knitter! Almost immediately, she's back, looking crestfallen. "Wouldn't you know? They're closed. Oh well..." She brightens in an instant. "We'll just have to do it here, then."

"Here" ends up being a deserted dialogue editing room—the most comfortable private space available in what is, after all, a full-scale post-production facility, and therefore a place more amenable to work than it is to the prerequisites of a quiet chat. Roberts settles down onto the sofa amidst trim bins and editing tables filled with neatly labeled spools of what the pros call "elements"—bits of 35mm film and magnetic tape which are in the process of being assembled into a "first cut" of "My Best Friend's Wedding," Roberts' new summer comedy, and the subject of so much of the activity swirling around her.

She doesn't sit so much as splay—majestically, it's true—and she still has about her much of that quality which made America fall in love with her back in her "Steel Magnolias"/"Mystic Pizza" period. In life as on film, she perfectly embodies the awkward, Everygirl grace of the gangly duckling, newly emerged as a magnificent swan. Her trademark flowing tresses have been cut back into a more fashionable and "mature" shag, but to look at her, it's still hard to believe that the 21-year-old naif who took America by storm when "Pretty Woman" earned $178 million and became the top-grossing picture of 1990 is now all of 28. Time, as they say, flies.

She looks radiant and unchanged. The only detail indicative of the growth and the distance is her absolute mastery of the Art of the Interview. It's a skill nobody is born with, but Roberts has it down pat. She seems absolutely spontaneous and totally in control, all at the same time.

"I'm so proud of everybody in the movie," she gushes about "My Best Friend's Wedding." "Everybody worked so hard, and they were all so charming. [Supporting player] Rupert Everett is the funniest thing to ever hit the planet. Truly. I mean, so funny that there were scenes where we'd be doing stuff and I would be laughing so hard that you can't even understand what I'm saying! 'Cause I'm trying to get through the scene, but I'd just be peeing in my pants!

"I'm gonna take so much credit for this," she says, her voice gone suddenly wondering and little-girlish. "Even though—heh heh—there's no reason I should. I was actually teasing [director] P.J. [Hogan] today about all the ways in which I'm gonna take full and complete credit for the movie." She laughs, then turns mock-serious on a dime. "If it's funny. But if it sucks, it's all P.J."

You can tell by Roberts' contagious sense of accomplishment that the possibility of "My Best Friend's Wedding" sucking has never so much as entered her mind. Nor, on the basis of the film's pedigree, is there any obvious reason it should have. In addition to British character man Everett (an actor she calls "our secret weapon"), her co-stars include Dermot Mulroney as the "best friend" of the title and "The Mask's" Cameron Diaz as his too-good-to-be-true intended. The screenplay is an original by Ron Bass, who wrote the Roberts-starring "Sleeping With the Enemy," but is most famous for his Oscar-winning "Rain Man" script and for his screen adaptation of Amy Tan's "The Joy Luck Club." The director is a hot young comedy "find:" P.J. Hogan, whose uproarious Australian effort "Muriel's Wedding" was easily the most engaging knockabout amusement of 1995.

> "I don't search for specific scripts. I just look for good scripts. If they're good scripts that are funny, then terrific. If they're good scripts that are tragic, then terrific as well."

Hogan's experience with the farcical treatment of matrimonial material must have come in handy on "My Best Friend's Wedding," a film which, like "Muriel," promises to do a great deal of comedic violence to the sanctity of the marital act. "The long and short of it is that my best friend is getting married," says Roberts. "He's someone who I've known for 10 years, and we were once lovers, and then that sort of didn't come to pass. And so we're best friends, and we've been best friends forever. Upon discovering that he's getting married, I sort of realize that, 'Well, he can't marry someone else because I'm in love with him, and he should be in love with me.'"

So far, "My Best Friend's Wedding" sounds like a poignant relationship film, about a situation more than a few people could probably relate to: the closing off of romantic possibilities when those we've loved commit to someone else. But then comes the comedic kicker, accompanied by a devilish variation of that toothy grin:

"And so I set off to this wedding to destroy it, so he'll be with me."

THE BOXOFFICE INTERVIEW

THE ONE

Objectively, there are at least two leaps of faith required by a set-up like that. The first is the idea that Julia Roberts—one of the most sought-after women of our time—wants a guy, you know, that way, but he doesn't want her back. Hardly a character the average American male is going to have an easy time identifying with. "Well thank you. That's a compliment," is Roberts' no-nonsense response to that.

The other leap of faith comes from the fact that Roberts will be playing someone who is both the heroine of the piece and a character who is, well, not entirely aboveboard. Or, as Roberts says: "Oh, well she's horrible. I mean, I used to make jokes when we were working, you know, P.J. would cut, and I would turn and say, 'EVIL...has a FACE.' That's what the one-sheet will be, a big picture of me that'll say, 'EVIL...has a FACE.'"

Just how horrible is Roberts' character, Julianna Potter? Well, it's safe to say that most people who face a situation similar to Julianna's have dealt with it wistfully, perhaps by ruminating a while on "things that might have been." Julianna takes a more active approach. "A lot of times" her character is "bold-faced lying," she says. "She's soooooooo manipulative, and she's trying to be so sneaky and devious. That's why it's really a delicate balance. Because hopefully, people shouldn't hate her, they shouldn't say, 'Oh, she's horrible and terrible, and I hope someone catches her and they send her off to be banished.' But [at the same time] she does cross the line."

What mitigates all that romantic treachery is the comedy, which Roberts describes as "madcap stuff. There's a lot of physical comedy in this movie, I mean I'm not the only one who's doing silly stuff like that. We sort of push the limits of comedy to just farce, to hilarious, Lucy Ricardo stuff."

It is pointed out that that's a pretty high standard to aspire to.

"It is a high standard," says Roberts. "But it's also a very specific concept of things that are funny."

And Roberts is a redhead of course, which may mean she has a genetic predisposition for this sort of thing. After all, Lucille Ball, aka Lucy Ricardo, was a redhead too.

Roberts' smile goes limpid with pleasure at the analogy. "I aspire to be Lucy Ricardo's...pinky," she says. "She was so genius. So genius."

Imagine having all that fun and getting paid for it, too. For "My Best Friend's Wedding," Roberts is reputed to have been paid quite a lot: $12.5 million was the reported amount, though Roberts says that "as I sit here, I can put my hand to God and say I don't know if that's the exact number. I can tell you that you're in the right Comiskey Park of it all, but I can't truthfully tell you what the number is. Nor would I necessarily if I could remember."

To an industry watcher, twelve and a half million seems a likely figure if for no other reason than that such a sum would put Roberts just .5 million past the salary commanded by previous record holder Demi Moore for "Striptease." In Hollywood, where numbers sanctify, such details are what good agenting is all about. But Roberts, who has often taken a fraction of her market value to do work she believed in, waxes passionate on the popular obsession with scoring star salaries and film budgets like ball games, and it's hard to deny that she has a point.

> "I'm not, you know, running around with a little banner with my salary on it and stuff. So that's not what it's about in this scenario."

"You know, when people walk around talking about how much they get paid and stuff like that, or if a movie costs $170 million to make, then you're making it about that, you know? But our movie has no colossal budget. And I'm not, you know, running around with a little banner with my salary on it and stuff. So that's not what it's about in this scenario. When actors do that, or when movies cost the exorbitant amounts to make, then I can understand the interest, because you're courting it. You're saying, 'Look at the money that's going on here.' But I don't sort of subscribe to that philosophy. Obviously. I don't even know exactly how much I made on this picture." She laughs. "I'll find out. I'll make a call."

Releasing "My Best Friend's Wedding" in June, the traditional month for summer nuptials, is perfectly in keeping with the film's wicked sense of fun. As a romantic comedy with "heart," "MBFW" also seems poised to become the answer to the increasingly shrill cries of "Let Julia be Julia!" which have sounded from some quarters in the last few years. As Roberts has gone about the business of expanding her range in off beat and arthouse fare like "Pret-a-Porter," "Mary Reilly," "Michael Collins" and Woody Allen's recent post-modern musical "Everyone Says I Love You," industry watchers who should know better have measured the grosses of these "niche" titles against "Pretty Woman," one of the most popular comedies of all time. Armed with such specious comparative data, some have publicly bewailed the fact that, according to certain narrow criteria, Julia Roberts has never been one to mind her place.

The argument goes like this: Roberts first achieved mega-success in "Pretty Woman," a light romantic comedy with fairytale overtones. Since that time, she has tried her hand, often with quite a bit of distinction, at an almost unimaginably wide range of roles—few of which could be comfortably fit under the genre heading of the film that made her a household name. Film pundits, who usually salivate like Pavlov's dog at the sight of a major star brave enough to rebel against a prefabricated persona, have instead repeatedly bemoaned Roberts' obvious ambition to be something more than great hair attached to a luminous smile.

This supposed preference for "dark" material purportedly has to do with Roberts' alleged difficulty in accepting her own celebrity. With the fact that she was once married and, like 50 percent of the once-married U.S. population, isn't any longer. With the omnipresence of paparazzi and scandal sheet journalists in her public life. Such pop-psychology from supposedly reputable journalists is the perhaps inevitable outcome of the fact that Roberts' popularity makes her the easiest headline for tabloid journalists since the heyday of Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis. Writers who would never dream of accepting a byline from the National Enquirer have to stand in supermarket check-out lines like the rest of us, after all.

"OUR SECRET WEAPON:" Rupert Everett and Roberts share a laugh on the set.

Kenneth Turan of the L.A. Times helped to launch the "Let Julia be Julia!" viewpoint in an August, 1995 mash note/commentary, plaintively entitled "Give Us Something to Smile About." The lead went like this: "The big question for Julia Roberts' career is: when is she going to realize that it's okay to smile again?" Entertainment Weekly, in its inimitable attraction/repulsion relationship with the rich and famous, went so far as to publish a "chart" last July which purported to show conclusively that the more Roberts smiles, the better her films do at the boxoffice. ("This isn't just a vague generalization," EW scribe Tom Russo solemnly intoned. "It's a fact!")

Roberts professes to be immune to such considerations. "I love all my movies," she says simply. "I don't search for specific scripts. I just look for good scripts. If they're good scripts that are funny, then terrific. If they're good scripts that are tragic, then terrific as well. It's really just the quality of the piece, it's not, 'Okay, let's go out and find....' 'Cause you can't do that, 'cause you'll never find it that way. It's like a needle in a haystack."

Roberts does admit that the success of "Pretty Woman" in some ways raised the bar for her where similar types of material are concerned. "For me, it's so hard," she says. "Especially to have had a romantic comedy be really successful the way 'Pretty Woman' was, because it's very difficult to then find other films of that genre that can compete with that." But the larger point, she insists, is the difficulty in finding good comedic material. "You don't want to go backwards, you want to do something that's better than what you did and different and has more to offer in some way. They're really the hardest scripts to find intact and with great quality, the sort of romantic-ish comedies. [With "My Best Friend's Wedding"], I just thought, 'Well hell! Finally! Something that's funny and fresh and has all these great relationship elements to it.'"

So Kenneth Turan should be pleased—not to mention millions of moviegoers if all goes to plan. After all, Roberts really is a master of light comedy—it isn't like she shouldn't be doing it just because a few curmudgeons want her to. And it won't be long at any rate until she moves back into a more "serious" role—"I mean to the point where it's shocking to me just how completely serious I was the whole movie. I'm like, 'Jesus!'"

Less than a month after "My Best Friend's Wedding" hits the bigscreen, Roberts will be at it again, this time opposite Mel Gibson in director Richard Donner's action-thriller "Conspiracy Theory." Gibson plays a paranoid anti-government loony who inadvertently stumbles onto an actual evil government plot; Julia is the young Justice Department lawyer who may be the cabal's unwitting target.

So what do you know? It sounds like someone finally got around to doing a screen adaptation of that popular old bumper sticker from the 1980s that read, "Just because you're paranoid doesn't mean they're not out to get you." With "Lethal Weapon" director Donner at the helm and Gibson as hot as he'll ever be following "Braveheart" and "Ransom," tagging "Conspiracy Theory" as a smash-in-the-making is among this summer's easiest calls. Among other things, "Conspiracy Theory" also makes Julia Roberts the first actress in film history to play the onscreen love interest of both Mel Gibson and Woody Allen in a single year. Which opens up all sorts of interesting lines of serious journalistic inquiry. Like: who's a better kisser?

"Ummmmmmm...," she says, drawing it out. Then she warms to the subject. "I kissed Woody more. I only did a little smooch on Mel. Just a little smooch, the way, you know, I kiss my mama or something. Just a little smooch. So I had much, you know, my kiss with Woody was a bit longer, I was able to assess more. And it was veddy nice. But the Mel smooch was good, you know. They're just different. It's like an apple and an orange. One's a smooch and one was more a kiss."

Making "Conspiracy Theory" was "rowdy in a completely different way from 'My Best Friend's Wedding,'" Roberts says. "Dick and Mel have made a slew of pictures together, and they've got their whole repartee, and they're big pranksters and they're very lighthearted and jovial, and both really loving and kind. So I was sort of just fascinated and enamored and a little terrified going into it. In this movie ['My Best Friend's Wedding'], I'm pratfalls and I'm mad and running around and doing all these things. In 'Conspiracy Theory,' I'm the straight man, all the way down the line."

Given the high profile and different market skews that "My Best Friend's Wedding" and "Conspiracy Theory" are sure to occupy, it's tempting to see Roberts' busy summer season as something of a "master plan." In contrast to the "little" movies she's lavished her talents on recently, which are created for a small segment of the audience and therefore designed to blossom and die, Roberts is very likely to prove inescapable to the average summer moviegoer, perhaps even into the early fall.

"Well, honestly, I wish there was more distance between the two. Because this is, like, over a year of my life that will come and go in a season. So it's kind of like..." She crumples in comedic anguish. "'Oh, spread it out a little bit! I worked really hard! I can't get another one out there before fall!'"

That said, is one of the two films perhaps a bit nearer to her heart?

"These are, um, I think they're both really entertaining movies," she says carefully. "Completely, utterly, completely different. [But] I have to say, if there's any lost soul in the world who I love and would send Christmas cards to, who's looking for, you know, 'I just want to go see Julia Roberts in a movie...' If there's that person in existence on the planet, then I would hafta urge them more towards 'My Best Friend's Wedding.' Just because, I mean, if you're looking for me, that's where you'd be far more inclined to find me."

She smiles, a picture-perfect parody of a little-girl-lost. "But I don't know if that person exists other than my mommy." She laughs. "If there is that person, I urge you..."

Then Julia Roberts tilts her head back, smiles that million-dollar smile, and laughs and laughs and laughs. ■

JULY TRAILERS

Can the movie biz match last July's "ID4"-powered take? It's gonna try.

Taking dead aim on the season's July 4th weekend—and, while it's at it, the rest of the summer as well—is Columbia's "Men In Black" (see photo below), opening July 2. Although it's been a while since a Sony title had films moving aside for it, the other studios—with the possible exception of Paramount, should "Titanic" not surface later—have programmed their schedules around "MIB."

But July is hardly a one-title month. Hot on "MIB's" heels come 7/11 is another sci-fi entrant, Warner Bros.' "Contact," bearing an impressive Jodie Foster/Robert Zemeckis imprimatur. On July 18, two big movies arrive, but thanks to genre differences they don't collide: the Paramount actioner "Face/Off," pairing John Travolta and Nicolas Cage with helmer John Woo, and Buena Vista's comic adaptation, "George of the Jungle." July 25 is also a two-fer: Warner Bros.' event picture "Conspiracy Theory," starring Mel Gibson and Julia Roberts, and Columbia's "Air Force One," with leading man Harrison Ford. Although both titles are thrillers, "Conspiracy Theory" leans toward romance, while "AFO" flies into the action zone.

Of course, a date voyage by "Titanic"—post-production special effects work looms as a delaying iceberg—could cause a constellation of date changes, so stay tuned. Yet, regardless, to borrow a title from Universal's July-undated release, it looks like exhibitors are going to get a simple wish granted: a huge turnout at their turnstiles.

Men In Black

"The Client's" Tommy Lee Jones and "Independence Day's" Will Smith are the "Men In Black"—two government agents (named K and J, respectively) of a top-secret federal organization that handles immigration for alien beings journeying to Earth. When they discover an alien terrorist plan to destroy the planet, the Men In Black must search out and destroy the otherworldly evildoers. This sci-fi adventure comedy is based on Lowell Cunningham's Marvel comics of the same title. Linda Fiorentino ("Unforgettable") co-stars. Barry Sonnenfeld ("Get Shorty") directs; Ed Solomon (who helped write both "Bill and Ted's..." adventures) scripts; and the "Twister" team, Walter Parkes and Laurie MacDonald, produce for Steven Spielberg's Amblin production company. (Columbia, 7/2)

Exploitips: Both Paramount (which moved its "Face/Off" to 7/18) and Fox (which moved "Speed 2" to June) have cleared the 7/2 decks for what at the moment is shaping up to be a "Titanic" battle between "Men In Black" and the James Cameron film (see P. 17). As with June's clash of the titans (avoided when "Speed 2" reswerved to 6/13, leaving 6/6 to "Con Air"), one competitor—"MIB"—will pull the action/sci-fi male demo, while the other—"Titanic," which has romantic elements—should get additional response from the distaff side. Advantage: "Men In Black." When it's a battle between space epic and period piece, the corsets lose to lasers.

Wild America

Set in 1967 and based on the true travels of wildlife documentarians Mark, Marty and Marshall Stouffer, "Wild America" follows the young brothers as they head across country with their camera, meeting ferocious animals and interesting characters along the way. Jonathan Taylor Thomas ("Tom and Huck"), Devon Sawa, Scott Bairstow, Jamey Sheridan ("A Stranger Among Us") and Frances Fisher (also in "Titanic") star. William Dear ("Angels in the Outfield") directs; David Michael Wieger scripts; Morgan Creek head James G. Robinson produces with Irby Smith and Mark Stouffer. (Warner, 7/2)

Exploitips: Winner of the month's invisibility award, given the attention being accorded the dreadnoughts "Titanic" and "MIB," "Wild America" is best sold to the family audience. Or so one would think; but, as shown by that demo's support of "Liar, Liar" (rather than "Turbo" and "Cats Don't Dance"), when faced with a choice between taking the tykes to pure kids stuff and enduring the two hours or taking them along to older-skewing fare adults will find more satisfying, the ones that buy the tickets (i.e., mom and dad) will often do the latter. Best bet: Emphasize the Taylor Thomas name plus the animals and aim for the single-digit age group.

Contact

Based on the late Carl Sagan's novel, "Contact" stars Jodie Foster as an astronomer who discovers radio signals transmitted from outer space. As countries around the world try to decode the message, she hopes to take her rightful place as leader of the scientific investigation and the first person to make contact with the extraterrestrials. "A Time to Kill's" Matthew McConaughey co-stars as a top-level government advisor who supports her in her efforts. James Woods ("Ghosts of Mississippi"), Tom Skerritt, Angela Bassett ("Strange Days"), John Hurt ("Michael"), David Morse ("The Crossing Guard"), Rob Lowe and William Fichtner ("Albino Alligator") co-star. Robert Zemeckis ("Forrest Gump") directs; Michael Goldenberg ("Bed of Roses") adapts Sagan's novel; Steve Starkey (also "Forrest Gump") produces. (Warner, 7/11)

Exploitips: While industry attention has been focusing on "MIB" and "Titanic," only weak signals about the approach of "Contact" have been transmitted. That's surprising because, despite her paucity of acting turns in the '90s, Foster remains an A-level star—and the Zemeckis name has to shine like pure gold in moviegoers' minds after the boxoffice of "Forrest Gump" (which in 1994 opened 7/6). Still, as a more serious sci-fi take, "Contact" will have a tussle with weekend #2 of the rowdy "MIB."

Star Maps

An ambitious 18-year-old son named Carlos (Douglas Spain), who dreams of breaking into showbiz, jumps at the chance to sell star maps in Hollywood for his corrupt, estranged father, Pepe. But his involvement in the business, a front for prostitution, makes Carlos rethink his commitment to family as well as his desire to become a silver-screen star. Efrain Figueroa, Lysa Flores and Kanner Jensen co-star. Making his feature film debut, Miguel Arteta directs and scripts; Matthew Greenfield produces. (Fox Searchlight, 7/11)

Exploitips: Given its no-name cast and crew, "Star Maps" has the Hollywood setting as its most obvious salable element. As an arthouse entry, however, the draw of that element is diminished; performance here will ride on reviews and word-of-mouth. Also, especially in those theatres where the likes of "My Family/Mi Familia" have performed, aim for Hispanic audiences.

Face/Off

John Travolta ("Michael") reteams with helmer John Woo (who directed Travolta in "Broken Arrow") in this action/thriller. But this time he's the good guy—or is he? Travolta stars as an FBI agent who trades identities with a terrorist ("Con Air's" Nicolas Cage) in order to catch him. Joan Allen ("The Crucible") and Alessandro Nivola ("Reach the Rock") co-star. Michael Werb and Michael Colleary script; David Permut ("Surviving the Game") produces with longtime Woo associate Terence Chang, Christopher Godsick and Barrie Osborne ("China Moon"). (Paramount, 7/18)

Exploitips: Early trailers make "Face/Off" look more like a Woo-type action product, but American audiences (unfamiliar with his Hong Kong films) already voted for Woo's work with their pocketbooks, giving "Broken Arrow" a $71 million takeoff. The sell here, though, is certainly Travolta and his teaming with Nicolas Cage, perhaps even hotter as an action draw after "Con Air." Unless other movies move (see "Titanic," above), "Face/Off" is nicely positioned, with the key date competition being comedic and early-weekend crowds now sated with "Titanic" and "MIB" looking for fresh excitement.

TITANIC

Writer/director James Cameron ("True Lies") recreates the ill-fated 1912 maiden voyage of the luxury liner Titanic in this epic action/romance. Using historical and fictional characters, this joint-studio production (Paramount has domestic distribution rights, Fox has foreign) follows the onboard love story between aristocratic Rose ("Sense and Sensibility's" Kate Winslet) and steerage passenger Jack (Leonardo DiCaprio of "Romeo & Juliet"). Billy Zane ("The Phantom"), Kathy Bates ("Dolores Claiborne"), Frances Fisher ("Female Perversions"), Bernard Hill, Jonathan Hyde, Danny Nucci, David Warner and Bill Paxton ("Twister") co-star. Cameron and Jon Landau produce. (Paramount, 7/2)

Exploitips: Although the "film-won't-be-ready" explanation for major-movie date moves (e.g.: "Volcano," "The Flood," "Speed 2") might have already been overworked this year, it might come into play again if "Titanic" sails for a new 7/18 berth. That date is already occupied by the same studio's "Face/Off," so it's just the sort of move that could cause a cascade of other changes. Still, studio execs might look to last year's Independence weekend opening of "ID4" against "Phenomenan," both of which did huge business, and decide that "Titanic" will skew like that Travolta title. (Of course, "Phenomenon" didn't cost a phenomenal $180+ million.) If so, exhibitors should play up the romance of the DiCaprio/Winslet pairing as much as they do the adventure element of the sinking liner. "Blasting away this 4th" could be an "MIB" catchline; here, something like "a voyage into love—and legend" would work better.

George of the Jungle

This Disney event picture follows the comic antics of the late-'60s cartoon hero, here made carnate by "Mrs. Winterbourne's" Brendan Fraser. In this live-action adventure/comedy, George returns to the jungle in order to defend his friends against evil poachers, thereby relinquishing all the comforts of modern-day life and the love of beautiful Ursula ("The Cable Guy's" Leslie Mann). Thomas Hayden Church co-stars. Sam Weisman ("The Mighty Ducks II") directs; Dana Olsen (who wrote Fraser's "Encino Man") and Audrey Wells ("The Truth About Cats and Dogs") script; David Hoberman, Jordan Kerner, and Jon Avnet ("Fried Green Tomatoes") produce. (Buena Vista, 7/18)

Exploitips: The Jay Ward series plays on Turner's Cartoon Network, so a tie-in with your local cable TV operator would help attract younger audiences newly familiarized with George's dumb-but-lovable ways. To pull the 40+ crowd who watched "George of the Jungle" as teens in their parents' houses during its original Saturday morning run three decades ago and now have homes of their own, a cross-promo with a local nursery—with prize winners being awarded with greenery re-genused as Watch-Out-For-That-Tree Trees—could generate amiable interest that should lead to boxoffice response. A yell-like-George contest could draw the media.

Nothing to Lose

Advertising exec Nick Beam ("The Shawshank Redemption's" Tim Robbins) is having a very bad day when he discovers his life is a total lie. But, when fast-talking carjacker T. Paul ("Bad Boys'" Martin Lawrence) attempts to rob him, Nick turns the tables on the mugger and takes him hostage. An unlikely friendship emerges between the offbeat pair. John C. McGinley ("Hard Eight"), Giancarlo Esposito ("Fresh") and Kelly Preston ("Addicted to Love") also star. Steve Oedekerk ("The Nutty Professor") directs and scripts; Martin Bregman and Michael S. Bregman (who partnered for "Gold Diggers: The Secret of Bear Mountain") produce with Dan Jinks for Touchstone. (Buena Vista, 7/16)

Exploitips: Like last summer's "Eddie," this comedy has been ambling about Buena Vista's early-season schedule, and its move here seems to be targeting Lawrence's urban-audience fans—given that the studio's "George of the Jungle" will uproot suburban comedygoers two days later. Given the wide-demo support for Oedekerk's "The Nutty Professor," Robbins' presence and the films' shared genre, however, that separation might not be so clean. Given that chance, and now that New Line's black/white buddy-buddy comedy "Money Talks" has exited 7/16 for fall, perhaps Disney will decide it has everything to gain by re-moving "Nothing to Lose."

Mimic

"Mighty Aphrodite's" Mira Sorvino and Jeremy Northam ("The Net") star in this adaptation of a Donald A. Wollheim short story as a scientist couple who use genetic engineering to save New York from a deadly disease. But their genetic dabbling leads to the threat of annihilation for Gotham's populace when something beneath the city begins to "mimic" the most dangerous predator of all: humans. Alexander Goodwin, Josh Brolin and Charles Dutton co-star; Guillermo del Toro ("Cronos") directs; Miramax co-head Bob Weinstein, B.J. Rack and Ole Bornedal (director of Miramax's "Nightwatch" and of its Danish-language predecessor) produce; and with six

you get a screenplay: del Toro, Steven Soderbergh ("Gray's Anatomy"), John Sayles ("Lone Star"), Matthew Robbins, Matt Greenberg and Peter Iliff script. (Miramax, 7/18)

Exploitips: Once upon a time, monster movies were indie (e.g., AIP) fare; from "Jaws" through "Lost World," they've gone studio upscale. In another back-to-the-past move that hopes to repeat its "Scream" success, Miramax ventures off its usual arthouse terrain with this sci-fi thriller, so a more mainstream response can be expected here—if "Face/Off" lets it. As for the specialized crowd, the script teaming of Sayles, Soderbergh and del Toro should generate expectations of something more than a genre entry.

LATE MOVIE MOVES...

Fall

"If Lucy Fell's" Eric Schaeffer's latest romantic comedy stars Schaeffer as Michael, a New York City cab driver who begins a passionate affair with a married supermodel named Sarah (Amanda de Cadenet). Schaeffer directs and scripts, and he produces with Terence Michael for Capella. (Orion, 6/20 NY/LA)

Exploitips: Despite calling Schaeffer (who here as in "If Lucy Fell" pairs himself onscreen with an uber-babe) "ever-irritating," our Slamdance reviewer (April '97) gave "Fall" a three-star review, saying that Schaeffer "has a gifted ear for dialogue and directs with style and flair" and that he "has bared everything in this sexually obsessive reworking of the beauty and the beast myth."

Head Above Water

In this black comedy/thriller, a married couple—a respected judge (Harvey Keitel) and his young wife Nathalie ("The Mask's" Cameron Diaz)—are vacationing on a tiny island shared by Nathalie's childhood friend (Craig Sheffer). While the two men are on a fishing trip, Nathalie's ex-lover ("The Phantom's" Billy Zane) arrives; when he's found next morning naked and dead in the bedroom, the vacation begins to unravel. Frequent Kevin Costner producer Jim Wilson makes a return to directing, and he produces with John Jacobsen ("Shipwrecked"); Michael Blake ("Dances With Wolves") scripts. (Fine Line, 6/20)

Exploitips: Held from Fine Line's 1996 slate, "Head Above Water" has an eclectic cast whose names will attract arthouse attention, with Sheffer newly prominent after "Bliss." The black comedy/thriller genre remains popular, if the film in question delivers, of course. Blake's "Dances With Wolves" credit is also a plus.

Things I Never Told You

This bittersweet comedy/romance tells the story of a suicide hotline volunteer ("Weekend at Bernie's" Andrew McCarthy) who falls in love with a young woman ("I Shot Andy Warhol's" Lili Taylor) who calls the line by accident. Debi Mazar, Seymour Cassel and Alexis Arquette co-star. First-time filmmaker Isabel Coixet directs and scripts; Dora Medrano and Javier Carbo produce for Spain's Eddie Saeta production company and U.S. outfit Carbo Films. (Seventh Art, June)

Exploitips: What to do when foreign-language fare isn't pulling in America, and dubbing is detested? Make your local fare (Canal Plus Spain, Catalan Films and Televisio de Catalunya funded here) in the easily accepted English language. And easily transported: "Things I Never Told You" czechmated the grand prize at last year's Prague fest. Actress Taylor is one of the reigning queens of the indie world, and the genre—romantic comedy—is an audience favorite.

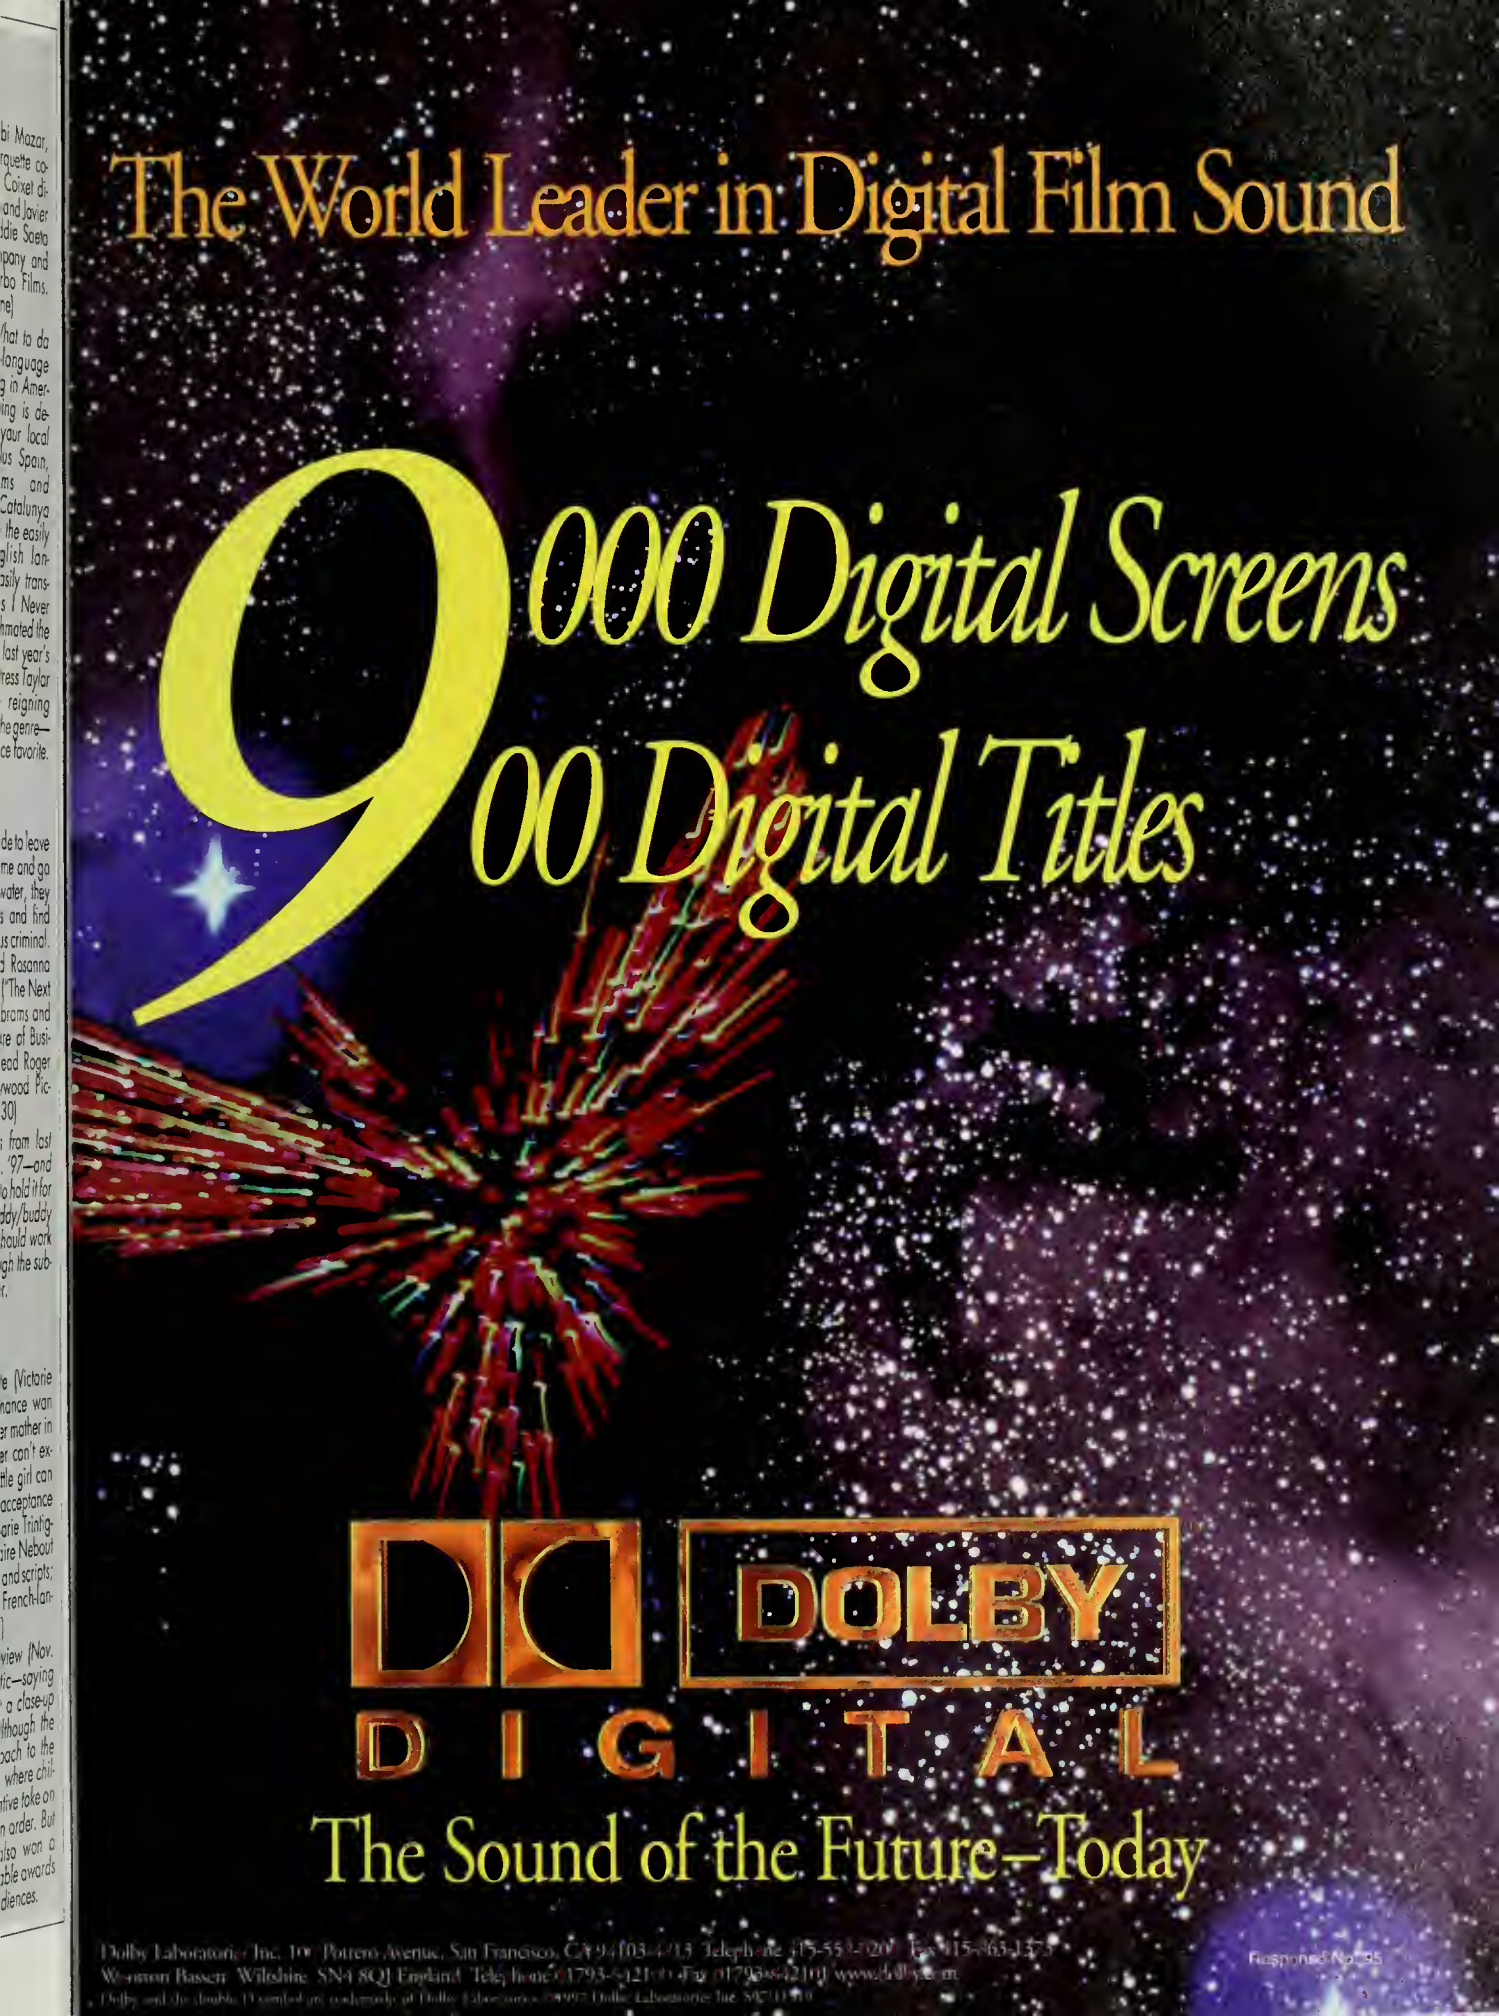
Gone Fishin'



Best friends Gus and Joe decide to leave their wives and problems at home and go fishing. But, before reaching water, they meet two gorgeous detectives and find themselves tracking a dangerous criminal. Joe Pesci, Danny Glover and Rosanna Arquette star. Christoper Cain ("The Next Karate Kid") directs; Jeffrey Abrams and Jill Mazursky (the "Taking Care of Business" pair) script; Caravan head Roger Birnbaum produces the Hollywood Pictures release. (Buena Vista, 5/30)

Exploitips: Disney held this from last summer and re-slated it for Jan. '97—and then, perhaps wisely, decided to hold it for angling season again. The buddy/buddy teaming of Pesci and Glover should work to draw diverse demos, although the subject matter might be a delimiter.

Ponette

When four-year-old Ponette (Victorie Thivisol, whose tykey performance won Venice's Coppa Volpi) loses her mother in a car accident, and her father can't explain the death in terms the little girl can understand, she must come to acceptance of the loss in her own way. Marie Trintignant, Xavier Beauvois and Claire Nebout co-star. Jacques Doillon directs and scripts; Alain Sarde produces the French-language film. (Arrow, 5/23 NY)

Exploitips: In a two-star review (Nov. '96 issue), our Venice critic—saying "Doillon obviously never met a close-up he didn't like"—said that, although the director's ultra-realistic approach to the material works well in scenes where children interact, a more imaginative take on childhood imagination was in order. But the fest results—"Ponette" also won a Fipresci critics prize—are salable awards that will draw specialized audiences.

Conspiracy Theory

This offbeat romantic thriller stars Mel Gibson as a paranoid taxi driver obsessed with conspiracy theories who believes a government attorney (Julia Roberts) is the target of a deadly intrigue. She thinks he's a nut—until she learns that, this time, he's right. Patrick Stewart co-stars. Richard Donner (Gibson's "Lethal Weapon" series) directs; Brian Helgeland ("L.A. Confidential") scripts; action honcho Joel Silver (another "Lethal Weapon" vet) produces. (Warner, 7/25)

Exploitips: One can expect Roberts' 6/27 rom/com "My Best Friend's Wedding" (see this issue's cover story) to have refound her adoring audience, and Gibson seems to draw regardless of genre. This is star-ticket fare with star-ticket competition—namely, Harrison Ford in "Air Force One." Advantage: "Conspiracy Theory." It has two stars playing a male/female duo (to draw both genders), it's lighter fare (good for summer crowds) and Ford fans recently saw him in the similar-genre "The Devil's Own," which fell off 50 percent on its second weekend.

Air Force One

Harrison Ford stars in this action thriller as the President of the United States, who has a strict policy of refusing to negotiate with terrorists. When Russian neo-nationalists hijack the prez's plane, Air Force One, with the First Lady and his child onboard with him, the President is faced with a personal life-and-death situation. Glenn Close ("Paradise Road") and Gary Oldman ("Murder in the First") co-star. Wolfgang Petersen ("In the Line of Fire") directs from an Andrew Marlowe script; Petersen produces with Armyan Bernstein ("Princess Caraboo"), Gail Katz and Jon Shestack for Beacon. (Columbia, 7/25)

Exploitips: "The Devil's Own" lost half its opening audience on weekend #2, but it did open to $18 million. And, unlike that film's foreign theme (the IRA), "AFO" is pure red-white-&-blue in its storyline, and the central crisis—a family in peril—is one to which American audiences often respond. (Especially, as here, when the bad guy is all bad.) As long as Greg Norman doesn't make a cameo in it, "AFO" should have good legs.

Box of Moonlight

Proper, punctual and precise electrical engineer Al Fountain ("Girl 6's" John Turturro) is in a mid-life crisis and revisits a childhood haunt only to encounter Kid (Sam Rockwell), a free-spirited eccentric who strikes a chord in Al that resonates through his life. Catherine

A Simple Wish

Little Anabel ("Matilda's" Mara Wilson) knows her father ("Michael's" Robert Pastorelli) longs to be a Broadway actor. Wanting to help, Anabel wishes for a fairy godmother—but she gets Murray ("Mars Attacks!'s" Martin Short), the only male spellcaster, and not a very good one. Then an evil fairy godmother (Kathleen Turner) hatches a plan to rule (i.e., ruin) the world's wishes. Michael Ritchie ("Cops and Robbersons") directs; Jeff Rothberg ("Hiding Out") scripts; Sid Sheinberg produces with sons Bill and Jon for their Bubble Factory. (Universal, July)

Exploitips: This family-fare effort has elements that could entertain both adults and children—a combination that many studio execs believe is the only way to package theatrical kiddie fare these days. In that light, "A Simple Wish" seems like the strongest entry yet to come out of Bubble Factory, despite its locking the TV tie-ins of Bubble's "McHale's Navy" and "Flipper." To maximize star wattage for those two demos, emphasize stars Wilson and Short.

Keener ("Walking and Talking"), Lisa Blount, Annie Corley ("Free Willy") and Dermot Mulroney ("My Best Friend's Wedding") co-star. Tom DiCillo ("Living in Oblivion," which starred Keener and Mulroney) directs and scripts; Markus Viscidi and Thomas A. Bliss produce. (Trimark, 7/25)

Exploitips: Our Venice fest critic accorded this comedy/drama a 2 1/2-star review (Nov. '96 issue), citing its agreeably "loopy tone" that, however, precluded having a clear ending: "The result is similar to a carnival ride that doesn't have a final, culminating thrill." Still, DeCillo's name will interest devoted arthousers, as will the Turturro credit.

Good Burger

Based on a popular sketch segment from Nickelodeon's "All That" cable TV series, this buddy comedy follows two offbeat high schoolers (Kel Mitchell and Kenan Thompson, stars of "All That" and of Nick's "Kenan and Kel") who help transform a failing burger joint into a hot spot, only to find the unscrupulous manager of the competing Megaburger on their trail in hopes of stealing the recipe of their secret sauce. Brian Robbins directs; Dan Schneider, Kevin Kopelow and Heath Seifert script; Nick vets Robbins and Mike Tollin produce in association with Nickelodeon Movies. (Paramount, 7/25)

Exploitips: "Good Burger" basically takes the slot occupied last year (7/10) by Nick/Par's "Harriet the Spy," which made $26.5 million. Given these films' modest budgets, that's a success in studio terms (boxoffice/production cost = profit), but not in terms of exhibition, where boxoffice = boxoffice. "Harriet the Spy" had a book tie-in, whereas "Good Burger" has a more immediate hook: TV. Develop tie-ins with your local cable operator and a local burger joint to target the single-digit ages who think Kenan and Kel are cool.

Director Kevin Reynolds ("Waterworld") switches to more intimate fare with this dramatic thriller (pronounced "one-eight-seven") about a deeply committed high-school teacher ("A Time to Kill's" Samuel L. Jackson) who returns to the classroom after a long recuperation from a brutal knife attack by an unruly student. A changed man, the teacher now is willing to employ extreme measures when dealing with student problems. John Heard ("My Fellow Americans") and Kelly Rowan ("Candyman: Farewell to the Flesh") co-star. Scott Yagemann, who spent seven years as a teacher inside the L.A. public school system, scripts; "Braveheart's" Bruce Davey and Steve McEveety produce for Mel Gibson's Icon. (Warner, 7/30)

Exploitips: Opening on a Wednesday, "187" has a two-day lead on its weekend's competition—and it might need that edge. The 8/1 slot is tentatively filled by Universal's TV adaptation "Leave It to Beaver," Fox's romantic "Picture Perfect," Paramount's sci-fi "Event Horizon" and New Line's "Mortal Kombat: Annihilation" sequel. On the plus side, that does mean that "187" has the drama genre to itself, but expect Warner to adopt a platform strategy to allow time for review and word-of-mouth strength to build.

JULY UNDATED

Alive and Kicking

This romantic drama (aka "Indian Summer"), about endurance, style and survival, tells the story of Tonio ("Stealing Beauty's" Jason Flemyng), a dedicated dancer with AIDS who buries his emotions beneath a witty exterior. Jack (Antony Sher) is a driven AIDS therapist who eventually becomes Tonio's lover. Dorothy Tutin and Anthony Higgins co-star. Nancy Meckler ("Sister My Sister") directs; playwright Martin Sherman scripts; Martin Pope produces. (First Look, July)

Exploitips: Given the month's paucity of indie fare, "Alive and Kicking" can be promoted as counterprogramming for the art-house set uninterested in the big blockbusters. Expect special interest to come from the movie-supportive gay demo in larger cities. Meckler's earlier work was a Seventh Art release (i.e., small) and this film is virtually starless, so the subject matter is the sell.

La Sentinelle

This French conspiracy drama about Cold War politics follows Mathias, son of a German border guard, who moves to France to study forensics. When he receives a mysterious package containing a shrunken human head, Mathias is drawn into an equally mysterious game of espionage as he dissects the head in search of answers. Emmanuel Salinger stars. Arnaud Desplechin makes his directorial debut. (Strand, July)

Exploitips: As with First Look's "Alive and Kicking," this Strand release could be effective counterprogramming for the season; here the targets are fans of foreign fare, as this is the month's only Euro-language offering.

Coffy

Pam Grier's biggest hit receives an almost 25th-anniversary reissue via Kit Parker Films. In the 1973 effort, Grier stars as a nurse who seeks revenge on the junkies who turned her sister into an addict. Booker Bradshaw, Robert DoQui and William Elliott co-star. Jack Hill directs. (Kit Parker, July)

Exploitips: Orion's "Original Gangstas," a contemporary variation on the blaxploitation films, didn't find a solid audience, so the time for the genre might be past. But '70s nostalgia remains strong, so emphasize that hook by playing disco on the sound system and having employees dress post-mod.

"DARK" MAN

Kiefer Sutherland takes on a new persona in New Line's "Dark City"

by Wade Major

Kiefer Sutherland and Rufus Sewell star in New Line's "Dark City."

What's in a name? Quite a lot, if your name is Kiefer William Frederick Dempsey George Rufus Sutherland. "I'm sure my father owed a lot of people money," jokes the star—better known simply as Kiefer Sutherland—of such films as "Stand by Me," "Flatliners," "Young Guns" and "The Lost Boys." "He probably said, 'I'll name my first son after you.'"

Either way, it's safe to say that, having done almost three dozen films in just 15 years, the 30-year-old has more than met the expectations of his famous name. (Dad Donald still has the advantage, with 90-plus turns onscreen.) As did his father, Sutherland has made his name with the kinds of roles that aspiring stars usually avoid: villains, miscreants and anti-heroes. With "Dark City," a New Line thriller coming in September, that might change.

"My whole desire as an actor is to keep doing different things," he says. "But I kind of wedged myself into a pattern for a while, and I wanted to break it. This seemed like the first effort to start the sidestep." Sidestep, indeed. To hear Sutherland describe it, "Dark City" promises to be little like any other film this year—or any year. Directed by "The Crow's" Alex Proyas from a screenplay by Proyas, "Kafka" scripter Lem Dobbs and David S. Goyer ("The Crow: City of Angels"), "Dark City" boasts a narrative that's already gaining a cult-like mystique.

Sutherland plays a doctor forced by an alien race to participate in experiments on human individuality in which people's memories are stripped away and replaced with artificial ones. One man (William Hurt) starts to discover the truth when his mind rejects the new memories. "It's one of the most complicated films to explain," Sutherland confesses. "The aliens are trying to find the soul, that intangible quality that makes humans individual. And they're dying. They share a common brain—they have no self-identification. If one has a thought, all eight million of them have the same thought. And their lack of individuality is killing them."

Much of what attracted Sutherland to his part was that it afforded him the chance to explore traits that audiences would least expect of him. He describes his character as "a deeply defeated, very sympathetic, frail, frightened little man. He came over with the others when they were stripped of their memories, and he is now the only human left who knows what's going on. He has had to live with the concept of their holocaust in his head. And I loved the idea of making a film about the value of the soul instead of trashing it all the time, about another society that valued our individuality. And yet it seems to be the one thing that makes us always fight."

Although they might seem bizarre and disturbing on the surface, Sutherland finds the themes of "Dark City" provocative and comforting, a shared perspective that helped ease cast and crew through what might otherwise have been a grueling shoot. "I have never been a part of a picture that was this big in scope," he says. "We had a quarter-mile river built on a soundstage along with buildings. We had 76 different sets like that."

Sutherland entered "Dark City" almost immediately after completing work on his bigscreen directing debut, "Truth or Consequences, N.M.," a project offered to him on the strength of his made-for-Showtime movie, "Last Light." But Sutherland is quick to stress the difference between it and his freshman effort.

Triumph's "Truth or Consequences, N.M."—which began a limited rollout in May—is anything but the small, intimate piece that "Last Light" was. "'Truth or Consequences,' when I read it, was more of an 'open' picture. More than that, it was like a collage of every film I'd ever loved, from 'The Getaway' to 'Freebie and the Bean' to 'Straight Time.' There were all these little stylistic things in the script that would allow me to make a film about a bunch of characters that reminded me of characters from that era, namely the '70s and early '80s."

> "I kind of wedged myself into a pattern for a while, and I wanted to break it."

The story of a quartet of crooks played by Vincent Gallo ("Palookaville"), Mykelti Williamson ("Forrest Gump"), Kim Dickens and Sutherland, "Truth or Consequences, N.M." begins like any other heist-gone-awry film but then takes a left turn when the gang kidnaps an innocent couple played by Kevin Pollak ("The Usual Suspects") and Grace Phillips. As the crisis deepens, Pollak's character is attracted to his captors' violent, reckless lifestyle, horrifying his mate and jeopardizing both their lives in the process.

"Here's a guy who pretty much does everything right, has a regular life. When confronted with these people who have stripped him of his masculinity, he starts to question himself. That was something different in the piece, that it did have that sidebar. And it's a credit to Brad Mirman ["Body of Evidence"], who wrote it, that it is so balanced." Sutherland also praises cinematographer Ric Waite, first assistant director Lee Cleary and each of his actors. "We had only $8 million," he says, "and for what we wanted to accomplish that was not a lot. It's thanks to everyone who worked on it that the film looks the way it does."

Admittedly bitten by the directing bug for the long term, Sutherland doesn't intend to give up acting any time soon, particularly after his experience on "Dark City." "Someone just asked me, 'Is it hard to do a film only as an actor now?' And I said, 'No. I just made a film with Alex Proyas that I wouldn't have wanted to touch with a hundred-foot pole. That would have made my brain twitch.'"

"Dark City." Starring William Hurt, Rufus Sewell, Richard O'Brien and Kiefer Sutherland. Directed by Alex Proyas. Written by Alex Proyas, Lem Dobbs and David S. Goyer. Produced by Andrew Mason. A New Line release. Thriller. Opens Sept. 12.

"MONEY" MAN

Actor Chris Tucker goes for comic gold in New Line's "Money Talks"

by Bridget Byrne

Chris Tucker and Charlie Sheen star in New Line's "Money Talks."

Reality" is a word Chris Tucker uses frequently. On the verge of stardom, with Columbia's "The Fifth Element" just behind him and his leading turn in New Line's "Money Talks" arriving in fall, he wants to keep his feet on solid ground.

Tucker is well known as a comedian and character actor to audiences who saw "Friday" and "Dead Presidents." His work in "Money Talks"—in which he stars alongside Charlie Sheen and Heather Locklear—could bring the 24-year-old the kind of broad recognition that carried the likes of Richard Pryor and Eddie Murphy to fame and fortune before him.

Exuding energy onscreen, Tucker comes across as sweeter off. In "Money Talks," a fast-paced action/comedy, Tucker stars as Franklin Hatchett, a charming but unprincipled street hustler who—thanks to a ratings-hungry TV reporter (Sheen) who tries to use him to break a story—is swept into an unlikely partnership that finds the duo being transformed into crimefighters. In the process, the reporter finds his plans for a weekend wedding to a rich beauty (Locklear) reduced to chaos by Hatchett's personality and run-for-your-life problems.

Tucker, who holds an executive producer credit on the movie, felt an early script was "mediocre" when he read it. But, believing it held ample opportunities for his own brand of improvisation, he oversaw a rewrite (the final credits are to Joel Cohen and Alec Sokolow, who did "Toy Story," and Vince McKewin) and brought in a new director, Brett Ratner, who has helmed numerous music videos for such artists as Public Enemy and D'Angelo.

"I knew Brett would make it cool and cut the movie quick, and he'd relate to what I wanted to do. I also knew that, like me, he would be looking to do his best," says Tucker, adding that most of the lightning-fast dialogue in the film is his own, either rewritten or improv. He describes the latter as, "What I woke up feeling, I said."

Tucker raves about Sheen, and not just because the flamboyantly high-living actor let him drive his Ferrari. "The prettiest car on earth," he says with a grin, dubbing himself and Sheen "both bad boys." Recalls Tucker, "We had a really good time doing this film, hanging out together. We came to work happy, we worked happy, we left happy. It was hard work, but it was happy work." Despite their camaraderie, Tucker stresses, "we didn't want this to be a 'buddy-buddy s—' movie. We wanted it to be more a fish-out-of-water style comedy, because both characters find themselves in worlds they are not accustomed to. It was important to us to feel, first of all, that everything was reality-based—and then fly with it."

The filmmakers create excellent visuals using a number of diverse locations in southeastern Los Angeles, including an explosive finale that takes place in the L.A. Coliseum. They also decided to rely on good tried-and-true stunting, rather than to use computerized special effects, so Tucker did most of his own running, jumping, ducking and diving. He did not, however, take a plunge from a helicopter into water—a task that was wisely left to a stunt pro.

The youngest of six children, the Atlanta-born Tucker was encouraged by his high school teachers to move his humor out of the classroom. "'It's great,' they said, 'but you need to do it on a stage!'" he says, recalling how he did just that and generated a big response while hosting a school talent show.

"Everyone said, 'Man, you was funny, you was funny, man.'" After playing some local clubs, Tucker headed west to Los Angeles, where he began doing stand-up before moving into movies.

> "It was important to us to feel, first of all, that everything was reality-based—and then fly with it."

Despite his success in Hollywood, Tucker wants to keep strong home ties. "I think of Los Angeles as like a big office. I'm just working out here," he says. (Indeed, on the day he spoke with BOXOFFICE, Tucker was next headed to the airport to pick up his mother, coming to see Tucker's new house. One hopes he made it to LAX on time; though he had a good reason, Tucker arrived late for the interview, and eventually admitted he's always late.)

Six feet tall and slim, with faint traces of a goatee on his freshman-young face, Tucker remains an unabashed fan of Pryor and Murphy, whom he regards as major inspirations, and he also mentions the influence of Al Pacino's work. Tucker says he's determined not to be a "fly-by comedian" and has worked hard to prove he can act—that his talents aren't limited to the type of characterizations he brought to the Allen and Albert Hughes drama "Dead Presidents," to the Ice Cube comedy "Friday" and to "House Party III."

As a step in that direction, he took a key role in May's "The Fifth Element," Luc Besson's sci-fi film starring Bruce Willis and Gary Oldman. Shot mainly at Pinewood Studios in England, Tucker says, the setting "was gloomy there, and I had no friends" nearby. But the experience of working with Besson ("La Femme Nikita," "The Professional") was worth the loneliness.

Aware that his career was moving to the starring rather than co-starring level, Tucker was cautious about what movie to do after "The Fifth Element." In the end, he chose "Money Talks." "I didn't want to be pushed into some stupid little comedy," Tucker says.

"I wanted something in which I felt I would have say-so with material I could really relate to," he explains. "There must be a reality base to anything I do. It takes intelligence to make real comedy, and it takes a reality base to create all that little stuff I like to do that makes you giggle inside."

"Money Talks." Starring Charlie Sheen, Chris Tucker and Heather Locklear. Directed by Brett Ratner. Written by Joel Cohen & Alec Sokolow and Vince McKewin. Produced by Walter Coblenz. A New Line release. Action/comedy. Opens October 1.

FOOD FOR THOUGHT

The Inside Scoop on the Concessions Business: Something to Chew On From 10 Industry Leaders

by Pat Kramer

RICHARD BIGGS
Director, Concession Sales
Ventura Foods/Lou Ana Foods
(Oils for concession and food service)

Career Highlights:
Since leaving the Air Force as a pilot, I have spent my professional career in the edible oil industry [margarine, cooking and salad oils and concession oils]. I have worked for such companies as Anderson Clayton Foods [later bought by Kraft], Standard Brands [now RJR Nabisco] and the last 18 years with Lou Ana Foods [now a division of Ventura Foods, LLC]. After a short time in personnel, I moved into sales/merchandising positions that included private label and national brand retail, food service, industrial, and, in 1989, concession sales.

Favorite Product:
Of course my favorite snack food is hot, fresh popcorn, preferably popped in coconut oil.

Greatest Challenge Facing Company:
To determine customers' needs and meet them profitably and promptly. My personal challenge is to keep my department focused on the needs of the concession industry.

Greatest Challenge Facing Concessions Industry: To "win back" the 80 percent of people who seldom go to the movies anymore.

MICHAEL BLOUT
National Sales Manager, Odell's
(Popcorn popping oil and toppings)

Career Highlights:
I spent 11 years in the banking industry, then the last 17 years with Odell's in my current capacity, representing the company to customers, buying the oil and overseeing the various manufacturers that we use.

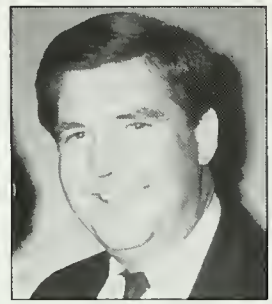
Favorite Product:
Real buttered popcorn.

Greatest Challenge Facing Company:
Keeping ahead of the new innovations in the delivery system [packaging concepts for the concession stands.] As the concession stands get bigger, the packaging system that we use now is probably not adequate for the multiplexes. We're innovating by coming up with the bag in the box to get away from the one-gallon jugs.

Greatest Challenge Facing Concessions Industry: The array of choices in concession items may be an overwhelming concept for those who don't get to the theatre that often. It slows down consumers' decision making process, which slows down the serving time and then you have longer lines.

ROY GOMES
VP, Sales and Marketing
Nestle USA/Sunmark
(Non-chocolate confections)

Career Highlights:
From 1985-'87, I worked in marketing for Proctor & Gamble, and from '87 to '92, I worked for Heinz USA. Since 1992, I've been with Nestle USA. In '96, I became manager of trade marketing and sales planning. I was promoted earlier this year to vice president, sales and marketing, for Nestle/Sunmark's special markets division.



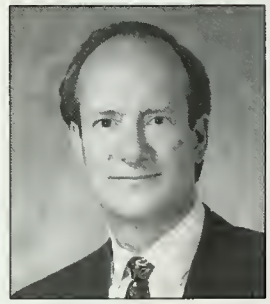
Favorite Product:
Willy Wonka's fruit-shaped Runts.

Greatest Challenge Facing Company:
Unlocking the tremendous potential of the brands this division markets.

Greatest Challenge Facing Concessions Industry: Concessions is more than just a convenience, as it's been thought of in the past. What we're going to see is a broader spectrum of choices with higher quality.

R. EVAN GORDON
Sales Consultant, Nabisco
(Gummi Savers, Snackwells, Now and Later)

Career Highlights: I have spent 24 years in the concession business, [including] a 20-year career with Coca Cola USA and the last four years as an independent consultant, primarily for Nabisco.



Favorite Product: Gummi Savers

Greatest Challenge Facing Company:
Developing and marketing a product that will be received openly by theatre consumers and by the moviegoing public.

Greatest Challenge Facing Concessions Industry: I think prices are too high. I understand why prices are so high in the theatre business—because of the revenue stream. However, in order to continue to attract larger groups at the concession stands, there needs to be affordable products to keep consumers in the habit of making a purchase when they go to the movies.

JOHN KRETCHMER
VP, American Licorice Co.
(Licorice confections)

Career Highlights: I come from a financial background, [in which] I spent 16 years with Price Waterhouse. Since I've been with American Licorice, the highlight has been the explosive growth of the licorice category. We've seen double-digit growth each year in all channels of distribution.

Favorite Product: Red Vines.

Greatest Challenge Facing Company:
Staying ahead of the growth curve that we've been experiencing in the licorice category. It's been a big challenge for our company to keep up with the marketplace and it's also been rewarding to accomplish that.

Greatest Challenge Facing Concessions Industry: To continue to provide superior quality and selection and to provide value to consumers.

FRANK G. LIBERTO
President/CEO
Liberto Management Co., Inc./
Ricos Products Co.
(Nachos, snack foods)

Career Highlights:

While I'm very proud of many of my accomplishments including owning and operating chains of retail snack bars and a coliseum, I guess the finest day of my life was when I was recognized by my peers in The National Association of Concessionaires (NAC) as having brought the concession industry its fourth greatest concession item—nachos—in 1977 (following popcorn in 1885, hot dogs in 1901 and carbonated beverages in 1950.) Knowing that your peers have recognized this creativity and contribution and having it evidenced by so many cash registers around the world—with nachos on the key—continues to be my greatest sense of accomplishment.

Favorite Product:

Of course, nachos.

Greatest Challenge Facing Company:

Controlling rapid growth and strategic planning to efficiently meet challenges of the technical paperless world of the future.

Greatest Challenge Facing Concessions Industry: Continuing to meet ever-changing consumer demands while at the same time not abandoning the cornerstones of successful concession operations. In that regard, remaining conscious of the consumers' threshold of retail pricing while offering excellent quality products and achieving a service level that is driven by the engine of reducing transaction time.

PAMELA MCGINNESS
Sales Manager
Promotional Management Group
(Movie graphic and custom popcorn buckets, cups, kids' trays, etc.)

Career Highlights:

I came on as controller of this company about six years ago. My first sale was to Pacific Theatres about three years ago, and it's grown from there.

Favorite Product: The collector popcorn tub.

Greatest Challenge Facing Company:

Just to produce as much product as people are ordering right now. The most important thing about our product is that it's completely dated. We're always on the hot seat. Each sale to a theatre chain is an independent sale. Every movie is a completely new sale.

Greatest Challenge Facing Concessions Industry: I think the industry is really faced with a "keeping up with the Joneses" thing. How can they get the hype, move the product, and keep their margins low? How do they make it attractive and package it, as well as make people buy it?

MARGIE MERCER
Director of Marketing, Proctor Cos.
(Design and manufacture of concession stands, concession equipment)

Career Highlights:

First of all, I grew up in the food service industry—my parents owned a restaurant. I started my career selling lumber and building products for Georgia Pacific where I learned to be a woman in a man's business. From there I went to pharmaceutical sales; I got promoted into marketing so I had both a sales and marketing focus. Next, I went to work for a medical ad agency in Manhattan.

I've been with Proctor for about two years now. This job pulls together my skills in construction, advertising, sales, and food service. Besides overseeing the marketing, I work with clients to design, manufacture and install the most effective food service and concession operation.

Favorite Product:

Designing the optimal stand to minimize transaction time.

Greatest Challenge Facing Company:

Keeping up with the demand. There is a huge boom right now in the theatre industry. We want to service all our clients as best we can but lead times are extremely short.

Greatest Challenge Facing Concessions Industry: Over 50 percent of all the patrons who enter into a movie theatre never purchase at the stand. The greatest challenge is in trying to provide supplemental offerings without impacting core products, namely popcorn and soda.

DAVID SCOCO
President, NAC
Managing Director,
Creative Concession Concepts

Career Highlights:

Prior to '91, I was the national development officer for a $300 million concession management firm in Chicago. In '91, I founded and became the managing director of Creative Concession Concepts. Since '94, I've also been President of the National Association Of Concessionaires.

Favorite Product: I would have to say delivering outstanding concession experiences to our customers at entertainment and leisure venues.

Greatest Challenge Facing Company:

To continually deliver professional and managerial solutions that meet the clients' objectives to improve performance.

Greatest Challenge Facing Concessions Industry: I think the biggest challenge for the industry is to continue to deliver excellent quality and good value to our consumers in an environment with significant issues regarding developing the labor force and efficiently employing capital assets.

ANDREW STEIN
VP, Stein Industries
(Popcorn & nacho warmers, popcorn poppers, butter dispensers; complete concession facilities; theatre lobby fixtures)

Career Highlights:

I grew up in this business, and have been working here in the family business since I was 18. [At first], I did a lot of drafting and installation work in the field. Then my duties grew. I started selling, worked with R&D, [and had] administrative [responsibilities].

I've done many duties here. Currently I run the company with my brother, Stuart Stein. We grew to new facilities that are really state-of-the-art. We do complete woodworking, sheet metal fabrication, electrical design—everything sold by our company is manufactured at our facility.

Favorite Product:

One of my favorite products is a machine we're making called the "Mr. Butter-Up Plus," which is built exclusively for Cinemex Theatre in Mexico City. It dispenses butter flavored topping, lime juice and taco sauce onto their popcorn, all portion-controlled.

Greatest Challenge Facing Company:

We're always trying to keep up with our customers' needs with the changes in the concession industry. People have gone to putting more and more food service into the cinemas than ever before.

Greatest Challenge Facing Concessions Industry: Right now, it's seeing if all these new items that are being adapted really work or make sense in a movie theatre.

CANDY MAN CAN

Norman Chesler Takes the Presidency of NAC With a Five-Step Strategy Toward Growth

by Kim Williamson

The reason I want to do this, first of all, is tradition. My father was a past president [1973-75] of the association. Our company has been involved in NAC from the very, very beginning. So there's that reason."

That's the primary explanation that Norman Chesler, president of Salt Lake City-based jobber/distributor Theatre Candy Distributing Co., gives for his eagerness to undertake his new role as president of the National Association of Concessionaires. Chesler takes the post on June 4, the third day of the annual NAC convention, this year being held June 2-5 in Anaheim, Calif. Trim, fit and ebullient, Chesler is eager to discuss his plans for NAC after the completion of the successful tenure of longtime head David Scoco.

Secondly, says Chesler, there are "professional reasons" for taking the reins of the 53-year-old organization, in that "my customers will know that I'm a professional, and that in order to remain a professional I belong to an association that keeps me educated, keeps me informed." But there's also a third explanation: the fun of it.

"I really don't look at this as a tremendous responsibility," Chesler says. "I look at it as a tremendous challenge. When you create a challenge, it's fun, it's exciting. And having no financial rewards as such to it makes it even more exciting to do. I hope that I'll be happy after my tenure as president in that I will have created and accomplished some of the goals that I've set for myself, and in that our membership will be much better off for it.

"It might sound hokey, but I think it is true that individuals must have something in their lives that's not just monetary. They also must have something that they can accomplish, that they can be proud of. So I don't see it as a responsibility—I see it as a fun challenge."

For someone interested in maximizing the fun aspects of NAC—"in order to make an association successful, we all have to enjoy it," he explains—Chesler has a clearly targeted, five-part business strategy that he wants to implement after he takes office. The key elements: NAC's certification program; member services; publication efforts; crisis management; and international growth.

"The first phase will be to revitalize our certification program," Chesler says. "That's schooling that we offer that instructs people in our industry on how to be a professional within our industry." The three most important avenues with which NAC provides training opportunities are a series of videotapes on concessions practices, which managers can use to instruct staff as the need arises; the Concession Manager Certification Program, a 3 1/2-day program offered frequently throughout the year in diverse parts of the country; and the famed Snack Bar University at the annual NAC gathering.

"We've created some excellent tools for our members," Chesler adds. "What we have to do is utilize these tools better. We have to make sure that our members, or even nonmembers, understand that NAC has these wonderful pieces of merchandise for them to use to educate their employees. Our major concern is that we want to help everyone in our industry be professional. It's not only that we want the public to be satisfied when they're at an entertainment experience—not only about what they're looking at and enjoying, but what they're eating. And I hope we'll be able to create more of these educational tools."

As the new century nears, NAC is considering taking its tutoring efforts online. "Another avenue we're looking into now with our programming at Snack Bar University is the Internet," Chesler says. "The electronic era is here—but where do we fit into it as an association? We know that the Internet is in its infancy and that we don't quite understand it yet. But we will understand it, and very shortly. To what extent we'll be involved in it, we don't know—as a lot of people in a lot of industries don't know yet. But we're preparing for it."

Second on Chesler's to-do list, "and just as important," is maximizing and even increasing NAC's services. "One very simple thing we might have," Chesler says by way of example, "is our own travel agency that would be available to our membership." But the new president has a wider-ranging take on member services than just hotel and airline bookings, as is made obvious by Chesler's essay as president-elect for this issue. (See p. 36.) In the belief that "membership services are at the core of what NAC is all about," Chesler plans to work with the board of directors, the executive committee and the various board committees to increase both the quality and the quantity of services to NAC members.

That's made clear in his solid support for the new publication endeavors undertaken by NAC director of communications Susan Cross, who has overseen the revamping of the Concessionaire newsletter into the four-color Concessionworks quarterly and the introduction of the biannual Concession Profession, the first magazine published exclusively for the industry. "We've already contacted members within our association and will draw upon their resources so that we can publish to our members vital information they need to know," Chesler says. "And that will be done through our publications. And we're going to add new features—as a small example, a help-wanted section. For someone in the industry who needs an employee, or for somebody who is looking for employment within the industry, we will provide a conduit—a communication system through which people can contact other people or organizations."

Chesler's fourth sector of attack is developing a crisis team. Exhibitors certainly are familiar with crises, thanks to the hit their popcorn sales took after 1994's coconut oil controversy, generated by a Center for Science in the Public Interest report. "We're going to create a crisis team that will be available to our members if, heaven forbid, they have a crisis—be it a food-borne illness, or a death within the organization, or a natural disaster like the earthquake in California, or an industry problem, such as the coconut oil controversy," Chesler says. "We admit that we did not react properly and with speed to that debate, and that will not happen to us again.

"We found out later that we had information with which we could have answered, and answered intelligently, by giving the public a better understanding of what they were eating and what were the ramifications of what they were eating. We could have given the theatres the information, which they could have posted on the wall. Because coconut oil is not so terribly bad for you, especially given the amount of popcorn a person eats at a theatre. And also it all comes down to this: that the public will eat what they enjoy, especially in an entertainment atmosphere."

Part one of Chesler's crisis management plan will be accomplished during the Wednesday morning program at the 1997 convention's Snack Bar University, when Robert M. O'Halloran, Ph.D. of the University of Denver's School of Hotel, Restaurant and Tourism Management, conducts a crisis communication session for attendees. As a second stage, NAC will be sending selected individuals for day training at the University of Denver "to be instructed in the proper way to handle a crisis, at least in the first phase. So we will then have resources that we can call upon, should any of our members have a crisis."

Like NATO, NAC is making a major move to go international, and Chesler wants to accelerate that action. "A lot of the supplier companies that belong to NAC are now doing business internationally," he says. "And they might even have products that they sell overseas but not in the United States. What's happening then is that international vendors desire this information—and they want to have a concessions stand that operates as effectively as we do in the United States. So they are coming to us, either at conventions or via correspondence, asking, 'How do I do this? How do I get ahold of this information?' Well, NAC wants to take advantage of this desire for information, and we have the perfect vehicle in Snack Bar University. It's very cost effective for our members, too—they have these people, their customers, coming to them to see their merchandise.

"So that's another reason for manufacturers or companies that are dealing internationally to belong to NAC. I feel that we're now one world, and we're very strongly going to try to entice the international concessionaire to belong to our association. We've already contacted people, in Europe and Australia and the Far East, and they've expressed deep desire to belong to our association."

It's an aggressive agenda Chesler has developed for NAC, but one that he thinks is not only achievable but necessary. A comment on the move into the international arena might be emblematic of his presidency's philosophy: "It's really our responsibility to take advantage of this need and offer this to our members. And so we are, and we will be."

SBU: Educational Excellence

By David R. Scoco
President, National Association of Concessionaires

Information is power, and those that don't have it will be left behind. To be successful, let alone on the cutting edge, it's vital to have the most comprehensive and current information available. As businesspeople, concessionaires and their suppliers must be current on concession issues as well as those relating to general management and marketing.

Enter Snack Bar University. For 16 years, SBU has provided NAC members and other attendees with timely, practical educational offerings in a concentrated three-day setting. For well over a decade, SBU attendees have gone home safe in the knowledge that they were taking back to their businesses information and ideas they could put to use immediately.

The quality of these sessions has been constant. Whether via a national speaker or a panel of NAC members, SBU has offered a range of educational opportunities that can't be matched anywhere in the industry. Building on that great tradition, the 1997 business sessions will cover issues relevant to all concessions professionals.

It's difficult enough to keep pace with the magazines, newspapers, journals, etc., in an effort to remain informed. But now there's cyberspace to contend with. The explosion and growth of the Internet and World Wide Web have opened another avenue in which we are expected to be proficient. But how do you find the information relevant to your industry and how can it make you more successful?

The opening session will deal with exactly that topic. "Driver's Ed for the Information Superhighway" will be exactly that—a road map for SBU attendees on how to use the Internet and World Wide Web in their businesses. Scott Helmers of the Harvard Computing Group will lead the session, and he has been hard at work researching our industry and surfing his way through cyberspace in search of information and resources. The program will consist of one large group session, as well as several smaller hands-on training sessions. These smaller sessions will allow attendees to have actual experience in accessing information on the Web.

The session will teach attendees how to find new customers, suppliers and information on the industry, and offer new ideas on how to use the Web to augment their businesses. Whether you're a Web veteran or have never ventured onto the information superhighway, we're confident you'll leave better informed.

Having the right information isn't enough if you don't know how to use it. And a crisis situation is no time to try to figure it out. Wednesday morning's sessions will be on "Crisis Communication," presented by Robert M. O'Halloran, Ph.D. of the University of Denver's School of Hotel, Restaurant and Tourism Management. The session will focus on developing a crisis management plan for your company. Certainly none of us wants to think about a crisis in our business. But that's precisely the point. Planning for the possibility can mean the difference between weathering that crisis intact or being destroyed by it.

The final day of SBU will be jam-packed with information. The morning begins with a session entitled "Dispelling the Myth—No Need to Promote Concessions." The session will be led by Jack Leonard, formerly of General Cinemas and a former NAC president. The program will focus on ways to promote and market your concessions using a variety of tools.

Following that will be two concurrent sessions, one of which will be on "Alcohol Awareness Programs," presented by Phil Blavat of Miller Brewing and David Tomber, CCM, of Multiplex. The session will include info on programs dealing with this vital topic.

To close out the educational portion of SBU will be the popular "Segment Breakout Sessions," in which attendees from various segments and venues participate in an interactive session relevant to their particular operations. Many attendees say that this environment provides some of the best practical information they could receive about concessions.

So that's it. Timely, practical educational offerings in a concentrated three-day setting, just like we promised, and just like we will continue to deliver at SBU. And that's a promise.

Back to the Future

By Norman Chesler
President Elect, National Association of Concessionaires

What holds true for the past holds true for the future....

As I prepare to assume the presidency of the National Association of Concessionaires on June 4, I am mindful of the tradition of the office within the association and within my family. My dad was president of NAC from 1973 to 1975. The main emphasis in 1973 was membership services. The same holds true in 1997.

Membership services are at the core of what NAC is all about, and the benefits of NAC membership are great. We've always had a tradition of providing members with a variety and breadth of products and services designed to assist them in becoming more successful.

High on this list is Snack Bar University/Expo '97, held this June 2-5 in Anaheim, Calif. This annual convention and trade show is the highlight of our year, bringing together the leaders in recreational and leisure-time concessions for all types of venues. SBU was conceived as an educational conference specifically for the concessions industry, and education is still the main focus. This year's business sessions are alone worth the price of admission.

The session on the Internet will provide information on how you can use this technology in your business. I'm very excited about this chance to give our members hands-on training in accessing the World Wide Web. The crisis management session will focus on a topic many don't think about. There are many types of crisis situations in business, and this session offers the opportunity to craft a crisis management plan for your business. Thursday's sessions focus on concessions—how to creatively promote your concession stand; alcohol and draft beer awareness training; and the popular Segment Breakout Sessions.

The Expo Trade Show brings the world of concessions right to your door, showcasing all types of products and services. This two-day show enables the attendee to do "one-stop shopping" for all their concessions needs. It's a definite "don't miss" show and a valuable addition to NAC.

Apart from SBU, there are many other forms of education available from NAC. Our highly rated Concession Manager Certification Program provides comprehensive training on how to successfully manage your concessions operation, no matter what venue you're in. The video training tape series is a terrific way to teach the basics to your front-line staff. And the Regional Meeting Series brings a high-quality, low-cost seminar out to members across North America.

And those are just the educational benefits! This year is a very exciting one for our publications, the communication to our membership and to the industry at large. Our traditional membership newsletter has received a new name, Concessionworks, and a bright, snappy four-color design that is already getting great reviews from our members. But we're not stopping there. This spring we roll out Concession Profession, the only trade magazine specifically for concessions. This magazine, which will be published twice a year, will provide feature articles, industry news, and advertising opportunities, all in a four-color format. These two publications will mean that NAC members will receive a quality, colorful publication every other month!

But it's not just the tangible benefits that make membership in NAC so valuable—and profitable. The networking within our association membership is one of the greatest benefits. Obviously, there are wonderful opportunities at SBU/Expo—in business sessions, at social functions, on the trade show floor. But there are also chances at regional meetings and at other industry events to connect with other NAC members.

One of the things I love about NAC is being able to pick up the phone and get information, a product referral, or an answer to a question from a fellow member. If I don't know who to call, I simply contact the NAC office and they put me into contact with the right person. Our members are such a valuable resource—because they come from such a variety of facilities, venues and companies, they represent a broad base of contacts. With e-mail and the Internet, new technology connects us like never before.

If it seems like I'm overstressing our membership benefits, you're right—I am. They're the backbone of this association, and many of our own members don't know what's available to them. So I'll just keep telling them.

I think the benefits to NAC membership are great. But we're not resting on our laurels. As the new president, I'll be working with the Executive Committee, Board, and Board Committees to increase the quality and quantity of services to our members. A lot of ideas are under discussion, including a way to connect our members and companies with available employment opportunities. We're going to keep expanding into the international market, bringing our concessions professionals together from around the world.

There are many opportunities, and many challenges. In order to make an organization successful, tradition is important, and tradition will be carried on.

The Force of Diversity

By Charles A. Winans
Executive Director, National Association of Concessionaires

When I tell people I work for an association that represents the concessions industry, I usually follow that statement with a short list to explain—"...like hot dogs, candy, popcorn, ice cream...." The people I'm talking to invariably get wistful looks on their faces, and I can see they're thinking about crunching on some hot buttered popcorn or a candy bar. The response is almost always, "That sounds like fun."

I then begin to explain that the National Association of Concessionaires represents concession operators in all types of facilities—"like stadiums, arenas, movie theatres, zoos, amusement parks, colleges and universities, convention centers, and so on." I continue by noting that we represent not only the operators but also the suppliers to the industry—the ones that make the food and beverage products, the equipment manufacturers, popcorn processors, brokers, jobber distributors, architects and consultants. By this time, their eyes have usually glazed over and I know I've lost them in the explanation.

It is precisely this broad definition of our membership that makes it so difficult to explain—and so wonderful to be a part of. The diversity of our members makes it challenging, yet the focus for all is the same: making concessions successful and profitable.

As the executive director of NAC, I am fortunate to be surrounded by staff and board members who strive to build upon the commonalities and celebrate the diversity. It is an ongoing challenge for all of us to choose the best ways to educate, train and inform our constituency.

I'm particularly proud of our accomplishments recently, and those to come in the near future. Most of these relate to our most important service—communicating to our membership. Last year our Marketing/Membership committee, under the leadership of Bruce Proctor, developed a plan to recruit new members to NAC through a membership recruitment video that could be sent to potential members and used at industry gatherings. After approval of the plan, the committee led the production of the videotape, which has been receiving great response. The video also won two prestigious awards, one from the American Society of Association Executives, and the "Telly Award" for business videos.

The success of this project led us to look at our other communication vehicles for our membership and the industry at large. After a lot of discussion and planning, we decided to make major changes to both of our association publications. The member newsletter known as The Concessionaire has been the first to undergo a metamorphosis. The name has been changed to Concessionworks, and it has received a major redesign, using four-color photos and bright graphics. The first issue, published in March, included feature articles, industry and association news, and practical tips for our members, who have been giving it rave reviews.

Next up is our new magazine, Concession Profession. As important as concessions are to the recreational and leisure-time industry, there is no industry magazine that specifically focuses on concessions. We felt a $9 billion industry deserved one. Concession Profession will be published twice a year and will include feature articles, industry news, and advertising opportunities. The fall issue will include the NAC membership directory in membership copies.

We are very excited about these major changes to our communication efforts. In a time when many associations are cutting back their publications to members, we are not only increasing our frequency and size but also putting considerable resources toward content and design. And, although this is a significant expansion in membership services, we are embarking on this without an increase in dues. In fact, we haven't had an increase in dues for nearly a decade. We are proud of the fact that we continue to give our members a variety of education, communication and networking benefits while keeping dues at a very reasonable cost.

Providing publications, as well as other benefits that meet the needs of our diverse membership, is not easy. But we continue adding, changing and refining our services so that we can best represent and provide for our members. We are fortunate to have a board of directors and active committees that devote considerable time and energy into making NAC the best association it can be. Their leadership and direction have kept NAC on a path that puts our members first.

At every Snack Bar University there is an attendee who makes a contact, learns a tip or simply makes a friend of someone in another aspect of the concessions field that they would have met nowhere but at SBU. And that's what makes diversity so great. Collectively, we are a force to be reckoned with.

An association is only as good as its members. If that is true, then NAC is great. In our diversity are strength and depth. At every Snack Bar University there is an attendee who makes a contact, learns a tip or simply makes a friend of someone in another aspect of the concessions field that they would have met nowhere but at SBU. And that's what makes diversity so great. It's not about who isn't a part of our small aspect of concessions; it's about who we are collectively. And, collectively, we are a force to be reckoned with. And, to paraphrase that popular series of movies this year, I guess NAC is "the keeper of the Force."

GLOBAL GOODIES

Movie snacks are a universal mainstay. But in some countries, hot buttered popcorn and Raisinettes take a backseat to dried squid and chicken feet

by Susan Lambert

Ahhh. An afternoon at the movies. Settling down in those plush red seats—with cupholders of course—ready to embark on two hours of adventure-romance-drama-laughter-tears. Tantalized with the shared experience of enveloping darkness and the shimmering light of the screen that will transport us to places unknown. Of course, none of it would be complete without a trip to the snack bar, tempted by the culinary delights of all those concessions. So sit back and indulge: crunch down on that tasty dried squid, wash it down with a popular Guarana soda, and what movie experience would be complete without that perennial favorite—sugared popcorn. Sugared popcorn?

Indeed, as the cinema market continues to expand throughout the globe, and as many stateside chains move beyond their borders attempting to bring the ultimate American theatre experience to a world audience, exhibitors find that stocking their concession stands requires a mix of traditional, typically "American" snacks and drinks alongside local favorites and food that would seem somewhat unique, if not downright unsavory, to domestic palates.

In fact, according to Tim Warner, president of Cinemark International, the number one snack food for movie theatres isn't our beloved popcorn, sugared or salted, but chicken feet. "Chicken feet in China—number one in the world." Warner explains, "They have such a huge attendance and that's the most popular snack food in China." Cinemark International has theatres throughout South America, including Mexico, El Salvador, Chile, Brazil and Peru, and it recently opened the Movix theatre in Kobe, Japan, in a joint venture with Shochiku. Warner says that before Cinemark moves into a location, it does local market studies to find out specific tastes of the area to adapt its concessions stands and CineCafes to the marketplace. But that wasn't always the case. "When we first went into Mexico, we did go in with just our U.S. products. We really made a point of it, and our concession sales reflected it because the market just didn't respond. We were forced to adapt very quickly to local tastes. It is essential that you do your local market research and then adapt your concessions to the individual country's taste." For example, bringing nachos into Mexican theatres may seem like a perfect match. Not so, says Warner. "They weren't really aware of what the product was because it's more of a Tex-Mex/U.S. thing."

DELICIOUS IN ANY LANGUAGE: Yogen Fruz (frozen yogurt) is offered at National Amusements' Maipu, Chile site; patrons can select different fruits to be blended in with the non-fat frozen treat.

Each country requires special consideration. In Chile it's sugared popcorn. Many locations require a wider variety of drinks, including coffees, teas and beers along with the standard sodas. Warner adds, "In Peru there's a drink called Inca Cola which is extremely popular. In Brazil there's a local soda, Guarana, that rivals Coke in that market, and it's very important that you sell both products." Also in Brazil, a cheese bread-like pastry is very popular with coffee, and Halls cough drops, of all things, are a favorite. That item surprised Warner. "They're sold as a concession item in all the concession stands. I'm sure we would never think of selling cough drops in the U.S." Warner adds that coffee is a huge seller all over South America. "It's almost as mandatory that you have the coffee available as it is the soft drinks." And each country has a different way of serving coffee. "In Peru, it's almost like a syrup. Coffee is served very strong throughout South America, but in some places you almost have to serve it on a spoon."

In the United States, concessions are traditionally a high-yield operation. Is that so with overseas theatres? Warner says yes and no, depending on the market. "We're finding similar or even higher cents per person in Japan." But Cinemark's Mexico and South American sites typically do about 50 to 60 percent of the business its United States theatres do. Warner attributes much of that to a lack of habit. "In most of the South American countries that we have gone into, the existing theatres did not have concession operations, or if they did they were very limited. So it does take a while to establish the habit, and you do have to build the audience for it."

Pickled squid is particularly popular in Cinemark's Kobe theatre. Other theatre snacks include dried squid and rice crackers. Warner hasn't yet sampled the squid, but he has tried the sugared popcorn and South America's popular Inca Cola and Guarana sodas. "The two soft drinks are sensational. In fact, I think the drinks would be well received in the U.S."

Dana Wilson, director of corporate communications for National Amusements, says there isn't a dramatic difference between what moviegoers like to eat at the movies in Chile and what United States audiences enjoy, with the exception of the sugared popcorn. The chain's Showcase Maipu theatre features sweet and salty popcorn as well as a popular frozen desert: Yogen Fruz. Wilson says it's one of the foods the company definitely wants to bring to the United States because it's so popular in Chile. Yogen Fruz is a non-fat yogurt blended with a choice of fresh fruit. Fruit choices include: raspberries, blackberries, mulberries, pineapples, mangoes and bananas. Says Wilson, "It's very popular. And in Chile they have such beautiful fruit. It's wonderful."

According to BOXOFFICE European correspondent Melissa Morrison, most Czech cinemas don't sell any concessions, but when they do, it's beer, wine, candy and chips. Prague's first multiplex, the Galaxie, keeps customers happy with ham-flavored popcorn and a full bar. Wallace Theatre Corp. has theatres in American Samoa, where favorites include a rice cracker called Mochi Crunch and the ever-popular dried squid. Polynesian theatregoers enjoy packaged betel nut, which is slightly narcotic and flavored with limes. The British like their sodas served warm, and they heartily indulge on both sweet and salty popcorn in fairly equal amounts.

AMC Entertainment International offers both sweet and salty popcorn at its AMC Arrabida 20 in Porto, Portugal, but wound up cutting back on the salt flavoring for Japanese audiences at the AMC Canal City 13 in Fukuoka. Gary Thyer, managing director of international operations, say it's because the Japanese audiences prefer a blander-tasting popcorn. AMC has also found the Japanese are not prone to indulge in the huge American-size containers. "We stepped down our drink and popcorn sizes with the thought that at some point [as moviegoing and concessions habits grow] we'll probably introduce larger sizes." Thyer says accommodations to the foreign marketplace have been minor. "Because we're bringing an American experience to these countries, we pretty much go off the American product and 'localize' it." AMC's expansion plans include Festival Walk 11 in Hong Kong and a 24-plex outside Barcelona, Spain. In each site, Thyer says, AMC thoroughly researches the location. "We do a lot of meetings, talk to as many local people as possible and get some market research going. Each market has a uniqueness that you need to address." Much of the research includes time spent in existing local theatres, finding out the good, the bad and the tasteless.

So although the flavor of the popcorn in Buenos Aires might seem bizarre to audiences from Kansas and the idea of squid and sequels isn't appetizing to teenagers in Seattle, think what audiences in Bangladesh could possibly think of Sour Patch Kids or Jujubees. So sit back, enjoy the movie and pass the chicken feet—yum.

GUARANA: THE BOXOFFICE TASTE TEST

Kim Williamson and the Mystic Guarana.

From out of the misty, mysterious plains of the Rain Forest comes GUARANA, an extremely popular Brazilian soft drink that, according to Cinemark's Tim Warner, outsells Pepsi there, and sells almost as well as Coke.

After carving our way through the Brazilian jungle with a machete (actually it was more like a letter opener) and locating the sacred temple (actually, the U.S. Post Office's Hollywood Branch), a sample of this legendary nectar was bestowed upon us by the Ancient Brazilian Gods (okay, so Cinemark sent us one). Would our Americanized palates be ready for so magical a draft? Well, yes and no...

RAY GREENE: BOXOFFICE Senior Editor Christine James, your reaction to this beverage from Brazil?

CHRISTINE JAMES: First off, I'm very glad that there are no crickets or squid in it. My first reaction is that it smells exactly like Easter-egg dye. I agree with Susan that we should have refrigerated it first, but other than that, it's kind of like a combination of cream soda and Slice.

GREENE: Thumbs up, thumbs down, thumbs sideways?

JAMES: I would say thumbs sideways. It might be more thumbs up if it had been cold.

GREENE: Would you like to refrigerate yours and try again later?

JAMES: No, because then it will lose its carbonation.

GREENE: It's just so difficult, boldly going where no man has gone before. What does this wonderful beverage product tell you about the people of Brazil?

JAMES: Deep down we're all the same?

Our intrepid Editor-in-Chief climbs into his canoe and paddles down the Amazon to the office of Associate Editor Susan Lambert, who has chained herself to a tree in protest against Rain Forest deforestation. He hands her a cup of Guarana and...

SUSAN LAMBERT: Smells like a Lifesaver.

GREENE: Alright, Susan, give it a try. Honest reaction, what do ya think?

LAMBERT: It almost tastes like a watered-down soda, Coke or Pepsi kind of thing, with a hint of fruity flavor. Orange is too strong—it's um, it's like if you left a Lifesaver in a can of soda and it fizzled away, it wore it out.

GREENE: Do you think this product has any future if it is imported into America?

LAMBERT: (trying to be polite) Ah, as kind of a specialty item, I guess.

GREENE: What does it tell you about the people of Brazil?

LAMBERT: They like their soda.

GREENE: Thank you for those apocryphal comments. Anything else?

LAMBERT: No thanks.

Meanwhile, BOXOFFICE Managing Editor Kim Williamson has been strapped by a tribe of angry native peoples to two pillars in a crumbling local temple, where he awaits ritual slaughter and the ripping out of his entrails, which are to be used to predict the outcome of BOXOFFICE*'s 1998 Barometer Star Poll. Not surprisingly, Mr. Williamson is his usual chipper and well-dressed self...*

GREENE: So what do you think, Kim Williamson?

WILLIAMSON: It's rather good. It has a sweet, yet alcoholy-aroma of NyQuil, yet it goes down rather smooth.

GREENE: That was good. And what does the popularity of this product tell you about Brazil, or does it tell you anything?

WILLIAMSON: They need more Dr. Pepper (laughs). Susan told me the folks who sent it thought it was especially sweet, but it's not that sweet. It's smooth, sweet and likable.

Snapping into Indiana Jones mode, BOXOFFICE Editor-in-Chief Ray Greene liberates Williamson and helps him to escape the restless locals by using the corkscrew in his Swiss Army knife in novel and unspeakable ways. He and Williamson swim upstream, where they rescue Susan Lambert as she is about to be devoured by nameless, multi-colored reptiles. Our courageous explorers return to Christine James' desk, where Greene celebrates a job well done with a taste of the mystic Guarana.

GREENE: (sniffing) The smell reminds me of my Dad's aftershave when I was a kid. Old Spice. It does have kind of the aroma of like a fruity wine or a brandy or something. You can tell there's like real fruit in here. So now to taste it, with the proviso that I don't generally drink sweet things.

(He sips.) To me it tastes like one of those strange kinds of fruity watered-down things that you get in art-house cinemas where all the people are trying to stay svelte. I think it's fine for what it is, I don't know if it will be my personal preference, but what can I tell ya, I'm a Diet Coke man. And as to what it tells me about the people of Brazil, boy do they like their fructose down there. Guess if you live in a country that exports a lot of fruit, this is the kind of stuff you drink. I don't know if it will work in the States, but somebody oughtta give it a try.

The sun sinks slowly in the Hollywood sky, and we bid aloha to the intrepid staff of BOXOFFICE*—spanning the world, so you don't have to.*

IN*VEND*TIVE SOLUTION

As Concessions Offerings Grow, Vending Machines Could Help Reduce Lines and Increase Profits by Pat Kramer

C.T. Four Distributing's Silver Screen air-popped popcorn vending machine.

Wally Helton, Mann Theatres' vice president of concession operations, says, "In the theatres, we have a motto: 'If the doors are open, we're popping corn.' There's nothing like the smell of popcorn to right the senses!"

But if popcorn stimulates the appetite of moviegoers, long lines can have the reverse effect. That's why many theatres are now turning to vending machines to offer patrons quicker sales, or in some instances, a different selection of snacks.

Helton notes, "I think that the place for vending machines in this industry is for additional points of sale, where a customer that just wants a candy bar and doesn't want to wait in line at the concession stand has the opportunity to purchase a candy bar or soda through a vending machine. It's never meant to take over and become the concession sales part of our business."

While oil-popped popcorn is still the preferred choice among moviegoers, Mann Theatres has recognized that some of its patrons prefer the option of helping themselves. For those people, Mann Theatres last year installed air-popped popcorn vending machines at some of its Los Angeles theatres. Distributed by C.T. Four Distributing of Fresno, Calif., the Hollywood Pop "Grand Popper" delivers air-popped popcorn in just 90 seconds, with a variety of interesting flavors. At just 108 calories per 32 oz. cup (toppings are an additional 112 calories), C.T. Four owner Teresa Block says it provides a choice for the health-conscious moviegoer.

> "If people walk into a theatre lobby and we've got all the kids we could possibly have behind the concession stand but it's just one of those 'Star Wars'-type weekends, an additional vending machine is helpful."

Describing how it works, Block says, "A patron puts money [the competitive price of $2] into the machine, and the popcorn drops into the popper where they can watch the cup fill up before them." With the push of a button, the customers can choose their favorite flavor: butter, white cheddar or caramel, which is then mixed in by an automatic stirrer.

Recently, C.T. Four introduced its "cadillac" air-popped model: the "Silver Screen." Larger than the Grand Popper, the Silver Screen holds more popcorn and more cups and is fully computerized. It also offers customers more choices of flavors: butter, Jalapeno (mild and spicy), cheddar, banana cream pie, strawberry cream pie, barbecue, caramel, caramel fudge, chocolate hazelnut, vanilla and pizza pizzazz. With very little maintenance required, the machines enable theatre owners who buy them to hold onto their profits, says Block. For most customers, though, C.T. Four leases the vending machines, providing full maintenance and restocking of the popcorn and paying those clients a share of the profits. With the opportunity present for the theatres to put their logos on the vending machine's cups, Block sees the enterprise as an appealing supplement to standard popcorn sales.

Although Helton notes that air-popped corn contributes to only a small share of overall concession sales, he believes it provides a useful alternative to waiting in line. "We had a market segment that we weren't hitting, or if we were hitting it, we were dedicating an entire serving station area to air popped. When you're trying to accommodate the masses and only 5 percent are going for the air popped, it just made sense to offer [the vending machines]. It was the freshest way to go, too—instead of getting air popped popcorn that was being popped the day before and supplied by our concession supplier, people could watch it popping right before their eyes."

Block acknowledges that air-popped corn has gotten a "bad rap" from previous attempts to market it. "Some of the theatres had tried air popping it in the morning, then it was put in to a bin. With air popped, you can't do that. It doesn't stay very well; it gets stale very fast. With our air popped, it uses no oils, and with the variety of flavors, it reaches out to the public."

Helton sees the value in terms of both profits and customer convenience: "If people walk into a theatre lobby and we've got all the kids we could possibly have behind the concession stand but it's just one of those 'Star Wars'-type weekends, an additional vending machine is helpful." Besides air-popped corn, Mann Theatres also use vending machines for Pepsi's 20-ounce "Quick Slam," selling drinks in plastic bottles which can be brought into the theatres.

While Mann is devoted to selling Pepsi products, the United Artists Theatre Circuit is using vending machines to bolster their Coca-Cola sales. Bruce Taffet, executive vice president of UA, says 80 percent of the 400-theatre circuit now has Coke vending machines in the back corridors by the auditorium, where they don't conflict with high-traffic concessions areas. Says Taffet, "We found that putting our Coke concessions in the back corridors, some of our customers—people who are in a hurry as well as our teenage market—tend to use them. [Teens] happen to think it's not real cool to go up to a concession stand; they usually hang out by our Coke vending machines in the vestibule or corridors on the way to the theatre auditoriums."

As evidence of the successful strategy, he points to a survey done on the Proteus network (a high-definition satellite TV link within UA theatres that polls patrons and gathers statistical information). "We can link 60 theatres or as many as we want and do surveys or introduce new product lines. We found that some teenagers enjoy the look of the Coke bottle—the 20 oz. plastic contour bottles. From the test that we did, we found that we had some definite incremental sales from the vending machines that were not cannibalizing sales from concessions. It was definitely increasing."

With its success at using vending machines for the full line of Coke products, Taffet says UA is now moving forward with bulk candy vending, which allows the customer who doesn't want to make a large candy purchase or who wants to taste a few different brands of candy a chance to do so without waiting in line.

Taffet's vision is for a row of candy dispensers, varying in height and color, artistically arranged so as to catch the eye along the back wall by the Coke machines. Says Taffet, "It's location, location, location. We have to make sure that we put the vending machines in the right areas so they draw on the right customers that we need them to."

"The place for vending machines in this industry is for additional points of sale, where a customer who doesn't want to wait in line can purchase a candy bar or soda through a vending machine. It's never meant to take over the concession sales part of our business."

While the future of concessions in America remains geared to the sale of food and drink, over in the United Kingdom the UCI theatre circuit is leading the way for new vending uses. Just before Christmas, it began a pilot program designed to test the marketing of food and drink along with different combinations of merchandise. Vending Intelligence, the vending machine manufacturer UCI is working with, is headquartered stateside in Culver City, Calif.

Tony Brinsley, general manager of Vending Intelligence, U.K., says, "UCI Cinemas contacted us and decided to install hot drinks, snacks and merchandising, with the emphasis on soundtracks. We contacted Gardner Merchant [a company that provides vending services to large organizations], then earmarked five sites at which we tried vending services as well as selling over the counter."

At each site, snacks, hot drinks (such as coffee and tea) and candy are sold beside vending machines stocked with soundtrack merchandise. Three sites use CD vending machines (two of which are converted snack machines). Although the company initially stocked the machine with soundtrack CDs only, Vending Intelligence has since expanded the merchandise, at the circuit's request, to include Top 40 artists as well as some bargain price selections.

Pete Folger, president of Vending Intelligence, affirms that the machines can be used for many different types of merchandise. "Anything can be dispensed in the machines, including a VHS box, a pager, CDs, audio cassettes, T-shirts, softcover books or video games. Currently [in England], we're dispensing items that can be purchased after the performance as a memento."

Despite Vending Intelligence's efforts to provide alternate sources of income for exhibition circuits, the company has received little response at this time. Says Folger, "It's ironic that England is a little behind us in architecture but may be a little ahead of us in unattended vending of merchandise." He adds, "We'd like to see someone step up to the plate and try it."

UA's Taffet says vending merchandise is something his circuit is not aggressively pursuing at this time. However, at Mann Theatres, Helton is considering branching out in that direction, although he comments, "We have to be careful that we don't violate our lease," referring to several competing retail music stores in the area of Mann's theatres.

His idea for vending merchandise is more along the lines of clothing: "We found a company to pack a T-shirt or painter's cap into the double-CD sized compartments. We're trying to get more of the merchandise lined up before we just get a machine and vend CDs or soundtracks out of it. Our preference would be to own the machine and get various types of merchandise, using Los Angeles as the test market. I want to be able to do something different and unique, and this method of folding movie-related T-shirts into a double CD looks kind of interesting."

As exhibition continues to find itself in an increasingly competitive arena, vying for its share of the entertainment dollar, savvy theatre owners must keep up with the changes in audiences' tastes and make convenience a priority. A vending machine could be the mechanical employee exhibitors have been hoping for—and one who's never late and doesn't require lunch breaks or overtime. You just have to know how to push its buttons.

SMUGGLERS BLUES

How Big a Problem is Food Smuggling to the Concessions Industry?

by Jon Matsumoto

It could have been a small bag of peanuts, a canned soft drink or even a container of fried chicken.

Whatever the item, it's likely that most regular filmgoers in North America have smuggled food into a movie theatre at least once.

Of course, theatre chains don't like their customers bringing in outside snacks or meals. Their objections range from the obvious (it cuts into their own concession business) to the not quite so obvious (it increases cleanup duties for their employees).

Most theatre chains have policies prohibiting food smuggling. Toronto-based Cineplex Odeon has signs posted at all of its facilities clearly stating this rule.

Yet when push comes to shove, a number of these theatres say they aren't about to get militant to enforce these policies. Ticket takers or ushers won't search bulging handbags or oddly shaped clothing items, nor will they patrol the auditorium looking for violators. Marci Davies, vice president of marketing and communications for Cineplex Odeon, says the company's employees will not utter a word even if they smell a Burger King Whopper and an order of fries wafting from a patron's suspicious looking backpack.

"It's really the kind of thing where we ask people not to bring things in but we don't search people or harass people," states Davies. "We don't confiscate food. It's a customer courtesy."

"We're attuned to customer service," concurs Fred Gable, vice president, concessions for Loews Theatres. "We're not there to harass people. If people bring something in, we're not the police and we're not going to jump on somebody. We think too much of our customers."

Davies points out that if a customer is spotted walking into an auditorium eating a non-theatre food item, he or she will be asked to consume it in the lobby. But it seems film patrons need only be discreet in order to get away with enjoying their contraband while viewing a film.

AMC is one theatre company that has a particularly liberal food policy. It allows customers to bring in outside food if it's similar to what's available at the concession stand.

> "We're not there to harass people. If people bring something in, we're not the police and we're not going to jump on somebody. We think too much of our customers."

"We take a little different tack than most circuits," says Phil Pennington, vice president, concessions for AMC. It seems that if an argument were going to be made for customers bringing outside food or beverages, it would be because the theatre didn't offer the items the patron prefers. But Pennington explains that by only allowing outside food that's comparable to what's sold at the concession stand, AMC helps protect against patrons smuggling in products that can be offensive or even dangerous to other customers.

Loews' Gable agrees that this can be a problem, citing Chinese food and hoagies as types of items that have an odor that might be distasteful to some and distracting to others.

"There are some foods that are more malodorous than others. Someone could walk in with [an item] that would give off a real pungent odor that would disturb other people," says Gable.

Pennington adds that greasy food items can stain theatre chairs, which increases cleanup costs. Plus, there's additional litter to be picked up after screenings. According to Gable, smugglers aren't particularly conscientious about disposing of their own food wrappings. "We don't mind picking up our own merchandise," Gable states. "But when you have to pick up other things brought in, it's a little disturbing."

There is also a safety issue involved in theatre circuit food policies. Bottles and cans, exhibition executives agree, can cause significant harm. There's the potential of these containers being thrown at the screen or at other patrons during a film presentation. Broken glass on the floor of a darkened auditorium can also lead to serious cuts, Davies points out.

"[The presence of outside food] also raises insurance questions," adds Gable. "There have been cases where somebody has slipped on a product which [a theatre] didn't sell."

There's no way to quantify just how severe a problem food smuggling is for theatre circuits. Cineplex Odeon's Davies and Pennington of AMC don't feel there's been an increase in such behavior. Conversely, Loews' Gable believes smuggling has gotten worse in recent years. He says the growth in non-theatre food wrappings and containers left behind in theatres is evidence supporting this claim.

Some circuits have attempted to ease the flow of food smuggling by becoming more consumer friendly. Clearly, there are some patrons who simply do not appreciate the food items being offered at movie theatres. In an attempt to appeal to health-conscious customers, Cineplex Odeon now offers trail mix, bottled water and several types of fruit juices.

"Over the years, as the population has gotten older and the demographic mix of the moviegoing public has changed, we have altered the offerings accordingly," reveals Davies. "Recently, we introduced a very wide coffee program, featuring our own brand of Cineplex coffee, which has been incredibly successful for us. We've got premium ice cream products in most of our locations. It gives us an opportunity to serve people who aren't traditional popcorn and soft drink customers."

GRAB BAG: While the incidence of food smuggling is impossible to chart, it's been found to occur within all demographics, but most predominantly with teenagers.

Loews has also broadened its menu, which now includes such items as buffalo wings and french fries. In a few theatres, the company has experimented with coffee bars and lobby seating with tables. Cafes can be found within concession areas at some Cineplex Odeon theatres as well.

AMC has also experimented with different food items. The chain has added such products as bottled water and bulk candy. But Pennington reveals that the traditional core items sell the best. "[In order of popularity] it's number one, soft drinks; number two, popcorn; number three, candy. After that it's hot dogs and nachos," he says.

Pennington says that AMC did experiment with trail mix, but that it didn't prove to be a "panacea." Pizza was also dropped from the menu. Problems keeping this item fresh contributed to its downfall, he states.

A number of theatres have introduced value pack programs. Taking a cue from various fast food restaurants, Loews and Cineplex Odeon combine various items on the menu and then offer them at a lower price than what they would cost if bought individually.

"The combo offerings make your selection a lot easier," says Davies. "So you can order combo [number] one and that might be two drinks, one large popcorn and one candy bar or two drinks, a popcorn and a nacho. Those offerings tend to change on a quarterly basis."

AMC has a special value deal for children but not adults.

Many theatre circuits have added larger sized containers for some of their menu items such as soft drinks and popcorn. These servings provide the customer with a better value on a per-ounce basis.

But Davies isn't convinced that expanded menus and value deals are enough to stop the dedicated food smuggler.

"You can buy a pack of M&Ms at a convenience store and it's a lot less expensive than buying them at a theatre," she comments. "If you're prone to that sort of economizing, I don't think expanded offerings will [make a difference]."

For the majority of food smugglers, smuggling is most likely financially motivated. There's no getting around the fact that theatre food, even with a value pack reduction, is often more expensive than what it would cost if purchased at the grocery store.

Theatre chain executives defend their concession prices by pointing out that they are no higher than those found at other entertainment venues such as sports stadiums and theme parks, adding that concession revenue is a vital part of keeping their theatres economically viable. Pennington states that food sales account for about 30 percent of AMC's earnings. For Cineplex Odeon the figure is about 25 percent, according to Davies.

"I don't think consumers have an adequate appreciation for the economics of our business, like how much it costs to rent a film and how much it costs to build the theatres we're building today," says Pennington.

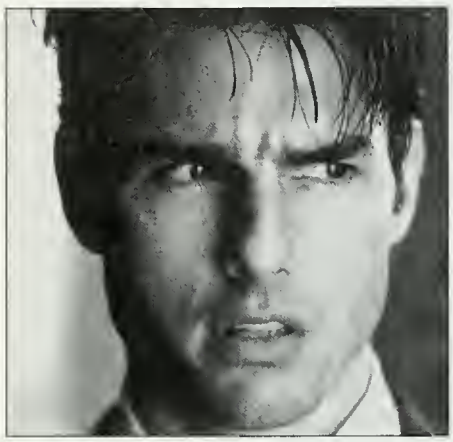
So just who are the main offenders when it comes to food smuggling in movie theatres?

To Gable, it's difficult to single out one group for blame. He says the transgressors range from teenagers to families with children to senior citizens.

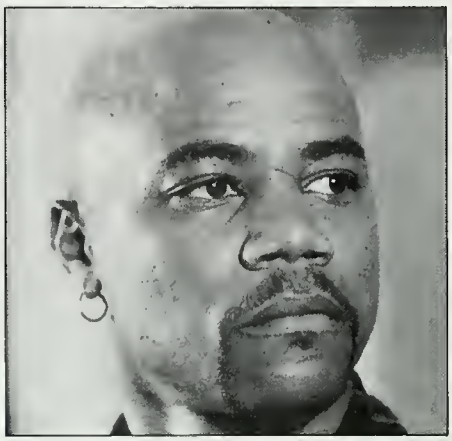
But Pennington says a study conducted by Coca-Cola in 1995 pegged teenagers as the most frequent moviegoing food smugglers.

"Something like 17 percent of that age group was smuggling something in every time they came in," he reveals.

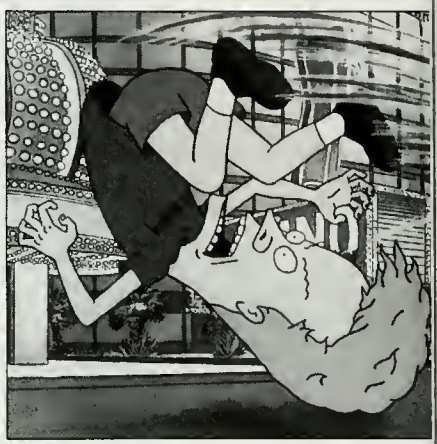
Pennington attributes this pattern to the idea that teenagers have the least amount of disposable income. Teens usually finance their moviegoing experience out of their own often limited allowances or earnings.



Families with young children are the biggest buyers of theatre food products, while senior citizens are neither heavy consumers nor heavy smugglers. Pennington says these observations were supported by the Coca-Cola study.



Gable, Pennington and Davies all believe that buying certain food items at the theatre will always be a part of the movie viewing experience for many customers. Indeed, it would be difficult to smuggle in popcorn that can match the taste of a bucket of the fresh, hot-buttered variety available at a theatre concession stand. And there are many consumers—particularly in the snack happy, couch potato American culture—who undoubtedly still prefer convenience over savings.



"People enjoy seeing a movie on a big screen with a lot of other people," observes Gable. "There's a big difference between watching a movie on TV and watching a movie in a theatre. The comedy seems funnier and the action seems more intense. Part of that experience is having a really good [theatre-made] tub of popcorn, a soda and something to munch on as you're watching a movie."

"There are some foods that are more malodorous than others. Someone could walk in with [an item] that would give off a real pungent odor that would disturb other people."

"MAGUIRE" NEGOTIATES WIN/WIN; "BEAVIS AND BUTT-HEAD" SUCK (Heh-Heh)

Who'd have thought that an energetic love story about a frantic sports agent finding his heart would not only capture audiences and reviewers alike, but also spark the most overused catch phrase of the year? With the exception of golden boy Tom Cruise in the lead, "Jerry Maguire" was practically a sleeper hit that surprised almost everyone with its off-season success. But supported by Oscar-winning Cuba Gooding Jr., "Maguire" brought in the cash (domestic receipts near $150 million and still going) and easily won both the Most Popular and the Best Film categories in BOXOFFICE's Fall '96/Winter '97 Blue Ribbon Poll.

"Ransom" kidnapped second place with 162 points, while the family puppy-fest "101 Dalmatians" collared third place with 101 plus 14 points (115 points). "The First Wives Club (with 78 points) and "Michael" (with 65 points) filled the fourth and fifth spots respectively. The comedy/horror film "Scream" scared up 64 points to take sixth place. The final four include "Space Jam" at number seven (62 points); "Star Trek: First Contact" at number eight (51 points); the explosive "Dante's Peak" at number nine (43 points); and "Evita" at number ten (28 points). The films in this category ranged from hard-edged thrillers to raucous comedies and proved to exhibitors that whether it be puppies, papas, agents, ex-wives or earth-bound angels our movie heroes come in all shapes and sizes.

Several of the Most Popular awardees also appear on the Best Film list, including "Jerry Maguire" at number one (141 points); "Ransom" at number three (107 points); "Michael" at number six (42 points); "Dante's Peak" at number seven (38 points); "Evita" at number eight (34 points) and "Scream" at number nine (31 points). Other films on the Best Film list were multiple Oscar-winner "The English Patient" at number two with 112 points; Miramax's Australian import "Shine" at number four (54 points); the controversial "The People vs. Larry Flynt" at number five (43 points); and "The Ghost and the Darkness" at number 10 with 29 points.

The results of the Worst Film category were proof that even if a film rakes it in at the boxoffice, exhibitors don't necessarily think much of it. The animated "Beavis and Butthead Do America" may have brought in over $62 million domestically, but it easily topped the Worst Film slot with 84 points. As Dale Haag of Cooper Theatres Mall Cinema in Hays, Kan. queries, "How can a movie like 'Beavis and Butthead' make so much money?"

In contrast, high expectations and low returns landed more films into the Worst Films department: Tim Burton's "Mars Attacks!" took the number three spot with 60 points while "Turbulence" shook in at number four (51 points) and the Arnold Schwarzenegger comedy "Jingle All the Way" jangled into the number five spot (50 points); Wacky comedies that weren't funny didn't fare much better: John Leguizamo's "The Pest" (68 points) bothered exhibitors enough to nab the number two slot; and "Meet Wally Sparks" plugged into the number six position (46 points). "Booty Call" (with 35 points) and "Dear God" (with 32 points) came in at number seven and eight while ninth place was a three-way tie between "Beautician and the Beast," "Bogus" and "High School High" (each with 31 points). Although Tim Veno of Carmike Cinemas in Connellsville, Pa. commented that there were "too many bad movies to choose from" many exhibitors felt overall it was a good seasonss. An exhibitor from Kings Drive In Theatre in Armona, Calif. summed it up best by saying, "I had thought that 1996 would be a record boxoffice year. Now it begins to appear that 1997 will surpass it. The releasing companies seem to have mastered the art of release patterns and excellent promotion and advertising."

Long-lead reviews from the German film festival

LUCIE AUBRAC ★★★

Starring Carole Bouquet and Daniel Auteuil. Directed and written by Claude Berri. Produced by Pierre Grunstein. A Renn S.A. production; no stateside distributor set. Drama/romance. French-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 106 min.

This taut, finely hued story is about the Aubracs, husband-and-wife members of the French Resistance—and that's about all it is. Writer/director Claude Berri ("Germinal") doesn't have much to add to the already full-to-bursting oeuvre of WWII Resistance films. The Aubracs were brave, the Nazis were cruel; that about sums it up. As a love story, the film has more heft.

While Raymond Aubrac ("The Eighth Day's" Daniel Auteuil) works to undermine the German occupation of France in the traditional ways, such as blowing up trains (a spectacular opening sequence) and attending secret meetings, his wife Lucie ("Grosse Fatigue's" Carole Bouquet) isn't content to just tend the hearth. She's up for spiking a traitor's jam with cyanide, if necessary. But what really rousts her formidable will is not love for France but love for Raymond. When his arrest by Vichy police threatens to conflict with the anniversary of their first lovemaking, Lucie storms into the state prosecutor's house and threatens him. The sheer intensity of her glare does the trick. The latter half of the film concerns a pregnant Lucie's machinations to rescue Raymond from a Nazi death sentence.

Auteuil, of the squashed nose and searching eyes, is the more emotionally grabbing of the pair. Bouquet's stern beauty makes her determination convincing, less so her passion. Her expressionless face saps several scenes of their power. Plotwise, a hint at what "Lucie Aubrac" could have been comes when Raymond comments on his life with Lucie amid the Nazi terror: "It's a terrible thing to say, but I can't help being happy." A film that explores the ambivalence of living in heaven at home and hell beyond the front door—now that would have been truly interesting.

(Note: October Films had made an at least oral agreement to acquire North American rights for $1 million but has since said it was nixing the pact. Paris-based Renn has filed a $10 million breach of contract suit.)

CONVERSATION WITH THE BEAST ★★★★

Starring Armin Mueller-Stahl, Robert Balaban and Katharina Bohm. Directed and written by Armin Mueller-Stahl. Produced by Rudolf Steiner. A Rudolf Steiner TV-Film production; no stateside distributor set. Comedy/drama. English- and German-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 96 min.

In his directorial debut, German actor Armin Mueller-Stahl (who played a Nazi in "The Music Box") takes on Hitler and comes up with this black comedy that manages to maintain its precarious balance between the bizarre and the morbid. Mueller-Stahl plays the man himself, a 103-year-old wacko who's trying to convince the world via a fumbling American historian, Dr. Webster ("The Last Good Time's" Robert Balaban), that a double took the bullet in that bunker with Eva Braun. This Hitler lives in a dungeon-like Berlin apartment with a perpetually young Teutonic wife, Hortense (Katharina Bohm), and a yappy dog named Jimmy. The dubious historian interviews Mr. Hitler about his entourage of doubles (one for each day of the week), his hatred of women (he says his weakness for them is why he lost the war), and the "magic" that keeps him alive, despite numerous suicide attempts.

One of the delicious ironies developed is that Hitler's special hell is not death but an eternal life in which he is a nobody. As star, writer and director, Mueller-Stahl pulls off this hat trick with aplomb. His aged Der Fuehrer torments Dr. Webster with slingshot pranks and then bursts into rages at being kept, literally, in the dark. The actor conveys the charisma that the real man had; the writer doesn't overreach for big statements; and the director keeps an odd commentary on one of history's most analyzed evildoers from dissipating into nonsense.

Among the highlights: a flashback in which a Hitler double, a frustrated actor, entertains the newlyweds with Hamlet's soliloquy, showing his frustration with his single successful role; and a scene in which Hitler auditions incognito for a Hollywood film about his life and is deemed too unnatural. It seems Charlie Chaplin got the glory Hitler thought he himself deserved.

THE KITCHEN ★★★★1/2

Starring Yasuko Tomita and Jordan Chan. Directed and written by Yim Ho. Produced by Raymond Chow and Yakichi Osato. A Harvest Crown Ltd. production; no stateside distributor set. Drama. Chinese-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 124 min.

Yim Ho's screen adaptation of Banana Yoshimoto's book weaves a kind of sensory spell in this story of grief and love, using poetic images, humor bordering on the surreal, and the lovely face of actress Yasuko Tomita as its charms. When Louie (Jordan Chan), a trend-overloaded hairdresser in Hong Kong, first meets Aggie (Tomita), she is almost catatonic over the loss of her last living relative, her grandmother.

The film watches Aggie revive under the care of Louie and his transsexual mother (and father), Emma (played by actor Law Kar Ying). Plot advancement seems less important than impressionistic scenes that sometimes overlap each other like wavelets. The story's power builds as the separate elements of the three characters' lives gradually entwine. This accumulative effect more than compensates for the movie's weaknesses, which primarily are a slow start and a sometimes awkward interaction among the players.

FOUR DAYS IN SEPTEMBER ★★★

Starring Alan Arkin, Pedro Cardoso and Fernanda Torres. Directed by Bruno Barreto. Written by Leopoldo Serran. Produced by Lucy Barreto. A Miramax release. Drama. Portuguese-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 105 min.

WHALES ★★★

Narrated by Patrick Stewart. Directed by David Clark, Al Giddings and Dr. Roger Payne. Written by Dr. Roger Payne, Mose Richards and Dr. Leighton Taylor. Produced by Christopher Palmer and David Clark. A National Wildlife Federation/Destination Cinema/Zephyr production. Documentary. Unrated. Running time: 44 min. Format: IMAX.

Never before have so many of these elusive mammals been captured on film as in the beautifully documented IMAX presentation "Whales." Co-director and DP Al Giddings ("The Abyss," "The Deep") brings his expertise in underwater photography to this film, creating elegant shots of these large but elegant creatures of the sea.

A tranquil scene from the IMAX-format documentary "Whales."

It's also a film rich in historical and scientific data. Over the course of eight years of research (two devoted to filming), the moviemakers joined the Whale Conservation Institute's research vessel, the Odyssey, on whale-sighting trips to Alaska, Newfoundland, California, Patagonia, Hawaii and Columbia. In the process, they were fortunate enough to be able to film a variety of species: humpbacks, rights, orcas (killer whales) and the largest of all, the blue whales.

The footage is quite amazing: whales breaching the water with their monstrous tails, hunting in groups (they assemble in a circle to trap fish), swimming in their deep-water habitats, and migrating to Alaska from Hawaii (where a female humpback teaches her newborn calf survival skills). Despite the presence of cameras, the whales are documented with as little human interference as possible.

And, although it's difficult to gauge exactly how large these creatures are without a visual point of comparison, they appear graceful and weightless in their acrobatic leaps into the air, balancing their tails in a handstand as they ride the wind. The mournful "songs" of the whales are also recorded, although it's hard to say whether the sounds they make are actually "songs." The "singing" can be heard as the whales hunt, interact with mates, challenge competition and navigate on their annual migrations.

To generate their footage for "Whales," the filmmakers had to camp out on boats and wait for their subjects to appear; with the revealing "Whales," their patience has paid off.—Pat Kramer

FEST

Brazilian young people who engineered the kidnapping of American ambassador Charles Elbrick ("Mother Night's" Alan Arkin) in 1969 to protest the policies of their country's military regime is indeed well told by Bruno Barreto ("Carried Away"); but its immediacy—the connections with larger themes that make a good movie a great one—is missing.

Most of the time, the Producoes Cinematograficas LC Barreto production comes off as a very well-made and well-acted TV cop drama set in a tropical locale. In at least one way, that's good: The kidnapping operation is rendered thrillingly. But the kidnappers are a collection of types: a humorless rebel leader (Fernanda Torres); a zealot-in-training (Calo Junqueira); an innocent destined to be hardened by experience (Claudia Abreu). Even Arkin as Elbrick is ever-stoic in the face of execution, although there's a nice touch in the respectful relationship that develops between the ambassador and some of his tormentors.

What the film lacks in depth, however, it makes up for in breadth: Instead of focusing solely on its collection of idealistic rebels, notably the film's linchpin, Fernando (Pedro Cardoso), the plot takes time to consider the event's other aspects, such as the personal toll being a torturer takes on a military cop (Marco Ricca) investigating the kidnapping, as well as the opinions of Fernando's friends from the old days, who believe there are less violent methods of change. The film also isn't content to end with the resolution of the kidnapping; the rebels are seen in an epilogue showing what happens after their initial glory fades.

Starring Lee Kang-sheng and Miao Tien. Directed by Tsai Ming-liang. Written by Tsai Ming-liang, Yang Pi-ying and Tsai Yi-chun. Produced by Chiu Hu-ping. A Central Motion Picture Corp. production; no stateside distributor set. Drama. Chinese-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 115 min. Won the Silver Bear.

Of the films screened in competition at the Berlin fest, "The River" ("He Liu") was one of the few that attempted to create the scope and scale worthy of recognition as an enduring and important film. Yet in that attempt it succeeds only partially. Its story: The young Xiao-kang (Lee Kang-sheng) is roaming around Taipei when he happens upon a movie being shot. The director asks Xiao-kang to play a corpse floating in a polluted river; Xiao-kang agrees, not having anything better to do.

Soon after, he's seized by mysterious and seemingly incurable pain. Meanwhile, his father, also drifting, is plagued by a ceaseless water leak from an upstairs apartment. The ennui and tedium with which Xiao-kang and his parents endure life is echoed in the film's extended shots of characters doing next to nothing and in the absence of a musical soundtrack. Even the impact of the shocking denouement is muffled by the film's deadening tone.

THE SOONG SISTERS ★★★

Starring Maggie Cheung, Michelle Khan and Vivian Wu. Directed by Cheung Yuen-ting. Written by Alex Law. Produced by Raymond Chow. A More Team Intl. production; no stateside distributor set. Drama. Chinese-language; English subtitled. Not yet rated. Running time: 147 min.

A trio of Chinese stars play real-life sisters who each embody a facet of 20th-century China: Ai-ling (new Bond girl Michelle Khan), the banker's wife, representing capitalism; Ching-ling ("Irma Vep's" Maggie Cheung), the first lady of modern China's founder, representing communism; and May-ling ("The Pillow Book's" Vivian Wu), the wife of Chiang Kai-shek, representing nationalism. "The Soong Sisters'" ambitious scope—the film spans 1900 to 1949—means its political points must be spelled out in capital letters. Political intrigues that affected the largest nation in the world occur here as controversial marriages and sibling rifts.

The movie succeeds better as a lavish soap opera, with the camera pausing lovingly on the Chinese scenery and the dewy stars. One possible reason: Hong Kong director Cheung Yuen-ting said she was forced to cut scenes featuring Chiang (Wu Hsing-kuo) before China's censors would release the film. What's left is a gorgeous movie, if not a great one.

THE STUNT WOMAN ★★★

Starring Michelle Khan and Samo Hung. Directed by Ann Hui. Written by Chan Man-Keung and Chan Kin-Chung. Produced by David Lau and Catherine Hun. A Daca Entertainment production; no stateside distributor set. Chinese-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 95 min.

With Jackie Chan's ascendance in Hollywood comes this film, a commentary on the Hong Kong action genre that's itself an action film. The hard-working Michelle Khan (who co-starred in Chan's "Supercop" and lately has reverted her name to Michelle Yeoh) is Ah Kam, an aspiring stuntwoman who fights on-the-job injuries and ganglike rivalries with other stunt crews to carve out a living. Structured in three acts, the film focuses as much on Ah Kam's personal life as it does on hyperreal stunts, including a cool one in which a bar fight is interspersed with similar violence playing on one of the bar's video games.

She also quits her job for the man in her life and becomes a surrogate mother to her murdered mentor's son. Both elements—action and plot—have a carnivalesque artifice, but the herky-jerky ride is fun. A side note: Director Ann Hui apparently kept the cameras rolling when Khan was injured performing a stunt—footage that, Chan-like, plays under the credits.

GENEALOGIES D'UN CRIME ★★

Starring Catherine Deneuve and Michel Piccoli. Directed by Raoul Ruiz. Written by Raoul Ruiz and Pascal Bonitzer. Produced by Paulo Branco. A Gemini Films production; no stateside distributor set. Suspense. French-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 113 min. Raoul Ruiz was awarded a Silver Bear for lifetime achievement.

Catherine Deneuve seems to choose film projects on the basis of how her character subverts the actress's image as a glacial beauty and Gallic icon. That would explain the appeal for her of this strange project, in which she plays two roles: a losing lawyer investigating a psychoanalyst's murder, purportedly by the victim's nephew; and the twisted psychoanalyst, in flashbacks.

"Genealogies of a Crime" begins on a dark and stormy night to appropriately menacing music. The rest has all the suspense of a game of Clue. Its fun comes instead from sly digs at psychoanalysis; e.g., those involving two professional archenemies, Georges ("The Party's" Michel Piccoli), who steals silverware, and Christian (Andrzej Seweryn), whose fastidiousness begs for his own therapy. There's also some theme about reincarnation and revenge from beyond the grave. Whatever. The best to be said for Deneuve's dual roles is that she looks fabulous in her Yves St. Laurent.

VIVA EROTICA ★★

Starring Leslie Cheung and Karen Mok. Directed and written by Derek Yee and Lo Chi Leung. Produced by Raymond Chow. A Film Unlimited production; no stateside distributor set. Comedy. Chinese-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 97 min.

The opening scene is certainly attention-getting: struggling filmmaker Sing and his girlfriend, pixiesh May (played by pop star Karen Mok), having enthusiastic sex that parodies the kind of soft-core porn that Sing is about to lower himself to direct, complete with rain that looks great on writhing, naked bodies—except the pair are indoors at the time. The jokes appear regularly but with varied success in this take on the filmmaker-struggles-to-keep-his-vision-amid-money-grubbling-producers subgenre.

In this case, the location is Hong Kong's movie mill. Co-director Derek Yee makes a brief appearance as a director who commits suicide after his latest work, "A Streetcar Named No Wheels," nosedives at the boxoffice. Although the effects here are cheesy and the plot is choppy, "Viva Erotica's" characters are appealing; for example, Mango (Shu Qi, a Chinese Jennifer Tilly) is a twinkie actress who delivers her lines in the film-within-a-film's obligatory rape scene with the urgency of a bureaucrat working unpaid overtime.

TERRITORIO COMANCHE ★

Starring Cecilia Dopazo and Imanol Arias. Directed by Gerardo Herrero. Written by Arturo Perez-Reverte, Salvador Garcia and Gerardo Herrero. Produced by Javier Lopez Blanco and Gerardo Herrero. A Tornasol Films S.A. production; no stateside distributor set. Drama. Spanish-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 90 min.

Version 4,381: Successful TV broadcaster (Cecilia Dopazo) goes to a war zone and must prove her mettle to hard-bitten male colleagues (Carmelo Gomez and "The Flower of My Secret's" Imanol Arias) while aghast at battle's atrocity. Includes lines like: "They don't even sell panties here—they sell horror." Objects blow up. She has an affair with a seasoned correspondent, their bodies lit by an exploding shell...the imagery! The camera moves dispassionately across the bodies of the recently dead and then upon one the cameraman recognizes...he can't film!

What distinguishes this collection of cliches is that the war in question is in Sarajevo, where the bodies of the dead in their graves have barely begun decomposing. Using recent events to illustrate some truths about the media and war has resulted in one of the worst examples imaginable: A real tragedy becomes moved even further into the realm of fiction in the passive perception of those who see it.

LE JOUR ET LA NUIT (no stars)

Starring Alain Delon, Arielle Dombasle and Lauren Bacall. Directed by Bernard-Henri Levy. Written by Jean-Paul Enthoven and Bernard-Henri Levy. Produced by Eric Dussart, Denise Robert, Jacques de Clerq and Alfonso Gomez-Arnau. A Les Films Du Leudemain production; no stateside distributor set. Drama. French-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 112 min.

French celebrity-philosopher Bernard-Henri Levy's latest attempt at cinema might not have detonated like a methane bomb if he had positioned it differently. He should have pitched it, instead of as a metaphorical exploring of a man's spiritual death and resurrection, as a "Gilligan's Island" remake.

There's the Skipper (a grizzled Alain Delon), a burned-out writer retreated to a Mexican beach; Ginger ("Celestial Clockwork's" Arielle Dombasle), a starlet eager to land the lead in a film based on the writer's first novel; the professor (Xavier Beauvois), a sullen seismologist and part-time rebel leader about as convincing as a bamboo transceiver; Mrs. Howell (Lauren Bacall), a well-dressed rich lady around a lot but rarely involved; and MaryAnn (Julie Du Page), who's ignored in favor of the more glamorous actresses but who has a pointless nude scene anyway. All that's missing is a tiny boat named the Minnow.

Starring David Arquette, Brad Hunt, Kathryn Erbe and Cathy Moriarty. Directed and written by Finn Taylor. Produced by Johnny Wow and Mitchell Stein. A Sony Classics release. Drama. Rated R for pervasive strong language, some drug content and sexuality. Running time: 96 min. Opens 6/20 NY.

Within about the first minute of the audience's introduction to Terry ("johns'" David Arquette), he has his pants around his ankles and is using binoculars to watch a neighboring couple's sexual encounter (which, to Terry's disappointment, is aborted before it begins). It's not exactly an endearing first impression, but it instantly reveals the lonely and pathetic life Terry leads and helps explain his suicide attempt that follows shortly after.

David Arquette stars in Sony Classics' "Dream With the Fishes."

Terry tries to muster the courage to jump off a bridge; his appointment with death is postponed, however, when a young man named Nick (Brad Hunt)—coincidentally, the gent that Terry had been spying on earlier—intervenes. Nick, who has only a few weeks to live due to an unnamed fatal condition, offers to help Terry end it all in a less painful way if Terry will help him fulfill some of his lifelong fantasies. Among these aspirations are a nude bowling match with hookers; dropping acid while driving; a visit to an aquarium; naked armed robbery; and a return home to confront old passions and demons.

Although "Dream With the Fishes" is based on an intriguing idea, is well written and boasts many humorous moments, Terry is too repulsive and Nick is too much of a jerk for the audience to care about the fates of these two people. An interesting character study, the film would have been more memorable had the protagonists been more likable. Also, given Nick's live-on-the-edge personality, one would expect more meaningful or even just more interesting lifelong fantasies than doing things in the buff. The absence of a wide variety of wild activities underserves the thematic construct.

Cathy Moriarty has a fun role as Nick's cool ex-stripper aunt, and Kathryn Erbe is strong as Nick's long-suffering girlfriend, whose hard exterior barely disguises her vulnerability. And, despite their repellent roles, both Arquette and Hunt do great jobs in fleshing out their characters; as the more charismatic, commanding and off-kilter Nick, Hunt is a standout.—Christine James

SPRUNG ★★★1/2

Starring Rusty Cundieff, Tisha Campbell, Joe Torry and Paula Jai Parker. Directed by Rusty Cundieff. Written by Darin Scott and Rusty Cundieff. Produced by Darin Scott. A Trimark release. Romantic comedy. Rated R for some strong sexuality and language. Running time: 90 min.

Packed with humor, wild sex and romance nicely wrapped with a message, this "romantical" comedy shatters urban stereotypes by taking them to the extreme without being offensive. Reality and humor are used to colorize circumstances and the resulting consequences for two different classes of folks.

Law-clerk Brandy (Tisha Campbell, of Fox TV's "Martin") and photographer Montel (writer/director Rusty Cundieff) are in love and about to move in together. Feeling their friends are making a big mistake, golddigger Adina ("Tales From the Hood's" Paula Jai Parker) and womanizer Clyde (Joe Torry, also from that Cundieff movie) plot diabolical and downright "ignant" tricks to sever the duo's romantic tie.

Cundieff and Campbell look good together, and their relationship is so perfect the story unfolds like an urban fairytale. "Sprung" also has a great supporting cast. With each film topping his last, Cundieff could soon merit comparison with A-list directors. Moviegoers springing for "Sprung" will find its mental and visual twists worth the investment.—Dwayne E. Leslie

VOLCANO ★★★

Starring Tommy Lee Jones, Anne Heche, Gaby Hoffman and Don Cheadle. Directed by Mick Jackson. Written by Jerome Armstrong and Billy Ray. Produced by Neal H. Moritz and Andrew Z. Davis. A Fox release. Action/drama. Rated PG-13 for intense depiction of urban disaster and related injuries. Running time: 105 min.

The cliche movie-review phrase "a roller-coaster ride of a film" comes to mind here, not only because of the adrenaline-pumped way the plot races over peaks of mounting dangers and valleys of humorous repartee, but also because it's the sort of movie you are exhilarated while watching. But when it ends you wonder, "Is that it?" With today's astounding SFX, a finale that's anything short of the movie theatre itself blowing up is bound to be considered anticlimactic. But in "Volcano's" case the build-up markedly exceeds the payoff.

Tommy Lee Jones stars as Mike Roark, head of Los Angeles' Office of Emergency Management, who realizes L.A. is in danger from beneath. After advising several precautions that are ignored by the predictably short-sighted, self-concerned higher-ups, Roark seeks out the advice of spunky expert geologist Dr. Amy Barnes ("Donnie Brasco's" Anne Heche), who soon deduces that volcanic activity may be afoot.

A decimation of cultural monuments that filmgoers have so enjoyed in such films as "John Carpenter's Escape From L.A." and "Independence Day" ensues, but some serious mayhem also transpires. As Roark takes charge in a race-against-time scenario, the film keeps a harrowing pace, even despite an out-of-place subplot involving an altruistic emergency room doctor and despite messages about racial harmony. But the action, the effects and tough-as-nails

McHALE'S NAVY ★

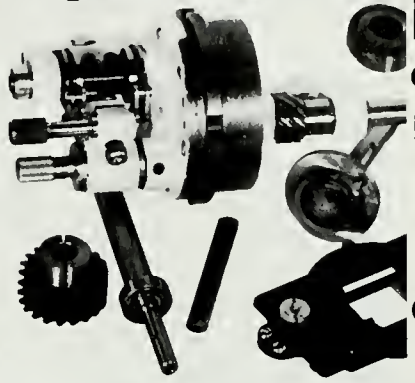
Starring Tom Arnold. Directed by Bryan Spicer. Written by Peter Crabbe. Produced by Sid, Bill and Jon Sheinberg. A Universal release. Comedy. Rated PG for action/violence, mild language and innuendos. Running time: 108 min.

The Bubble Factory seems to be producing movies using the Savoy model, in which each new release is even worse than the one that preceded it. Thus, in the wake of "Flipper" and "The Pest," arrives sinking-ship "McHale's Navy," a comedy based on the 1960s TV series. There is one laugh, and several good explosions. But boomers familiar with the fitfully comic but always comradely-toned small-screen series will quickly realize that both the tone and usual narrative flow of the original have here become so much flotsam, with director Bryan Spicer ("Mighty Morphin Power Rangers") and scripter Peter Crabbe ("Car 54, Where Are You?") tracking their own Polaris. One might suggest a compass check.

Not satisfied with one new tone, Spicer launches a flotilla, making adjacent scenes—of Bond-like action, family emoting, popeyed comedy and little-kids flickery—feel as if they're doing battle in some cinematic Guadalcanal. Rather than worry about his story reaching shore, Crabbe acts like a Wolf Pack raider, intent on sending his narrative to the bottom. As for military reality, a screen image that reads "aquire [sic] target" says it all.—Kim Williamson

MURDER AT 1600 ★★★

Starring Wesley Snipes, Diane Lane, Alan Alda, Daniel Benzali and Ronny Cox. Directed by Dwight Little. Written by Wayne Beach and David Hodgin. Produced by Arnold Kopelson and Arnon Milchan. A Warner Bros. release. Thriller. Rated R for sexuality, violence and some language. Running time: 106 min.



More cartoonlike, and more entertaining, than Clint Eastwood's "Absolute Power," Dwight Little's "Murder at 1600" originally was set to open ahead of that Castle Rock film before Warner Bros. pushed it back, in what could be interpreted as a favor to its resident screen legend. But, with a winning performance by Wesley Snipes as an honest D.C. cop unraveling a White House murder coverup, this Regency production more than holds its own against Eastwood's muted, muddled take on governmental corruption.

With the added metaphorical nuance of centering the story on an African-American cop whose tenacious devotion to duty is all that stands between the Republic and chaos, "Murder at 1600" has a ballsy, up-yours

FLASHBACK: MAY 18, 1959
What BOXOFFICE said about...

HERCULES

[This June 27, Buena Vista makes a cartoon of the mightily thewed man/god with its 35th animated film, "Hercules." But we thought we'd travel back four decades to see what BOXOFFICE thought of the live-action costume drama that in July 1959 Warner Bros. imported to the States. This Italian production (filmed in 1957 under the title "Le Fatiche di Ercole") starred bodybuilder Steve Reeves, who also played the hero in "Hercules Unchained" and went on to star in such spectacles as "The Last Days of Pompeii." Alan Steel took over for "Hercules Against Rome" and "Hercules Against the Moon Men" (in Cromoscope!). After a two-decade break, the Italians relaunched the saga with another bodybuilder, Lou Ferrigno, with the early 1980s' "Hercules" and "Hercules II."]

An elaborately staged and splendidly photographed costume spectacle packed with hair-raising adventures of the comic book variety, this Italian-made picture produced by Federico Teti is ideally suited to the fast playoff of saturation bookings, where the youngsters and action fans will "eat it up," or for the drive-ins. Joseph E. Levine, who had tremendous success with "Attila," also an Italian action spectacle, is planning a colossal exploitation campaign to launch this film for its summer showings, and the mass public is sure to make it a boxoffice hit. But, because sophisticated patrons might scoff at the early De Mille-type lavishness and pageantry, key city first runs should be bypassed. The only selling name is Steve Reeves, a handsome "hunk of man" who was Mr. Universe and whose weight and chest and waist measurements are played up as much as are Marilyn Monroe's. Reeves, who plays the title role, will never win any acting awards, and Sylva Koscina and some of the other Italian players are less than adequate—except visually. Director Pietro Francisci concentrates on the storybook action. Magnificently shown in Dyaliscope and Eastman Color. Starring Steve Reeves, Sylva Koscina and Fabrizi Mioni.

Joseph E. Levine's big selling campaign includes radio, TV and magazines, as well as Vaughn Monroe's RCA Victor recording of the title song. Publicize Steve Reeves.

attitude toward entrenched authority that audiences will find refreshing. Still, the movie would have been far more disturbing if all the government honchos weren't such caricatures of evil or ineffectuality. Ludicrously overblown thriller music by Christopher Young works against Little's sharply paced direction. Snipes' thoughtful, droll performance again shows his impressive range, but he's not allowed even a glimmer of sexual chemistry with white leading lady Diane Lane, playing a Secret Service agent who gradually becomes his ally. As a result, Lane is stuck on one dour-and-haggard note.—Joseph McBride

8 HEADS IN A DUFFEL BAG ★★1/2

Starring Joe Pesci, Andy Comeau and Kristy Swanson. Directed and written by Tom Schulman. Produced by Brad Krevoy, Steve Stabler and John Bertolli. An Orion release. Comedy. Rated R for language. Running time: 95 min.

Halfway between the laugh-meter results for its "Dumb & Dumber" and "Kingpin," this latest effort from producer Brad Krevoy and Steve Stabler's MPCA mines the sporadic gold nugget from its gumbah-comedy terrain. The story, provided by debut director Tom Schulman (Oscar winner for his "Dead Poets Society" script), follows a mob bagman (Joe Pesci, lowkey for him)—his consignment: eight heads—as he travels to Mexico to retrieve the duffel bag that holds them, accidentally in the hands of medical student Charlie (ineffective newcomer Andy Comeau). Comic catastrophe occurs.

Or is meant to occur. One person discovering heads in a bag might be funny, but the audience quickly adjusts to that peculiar scenario and goes looking for new laughs. Not until David Spade ("Black Sheep") comes on the scene as a college chum do matters really perk up. Had this abrasive actor been paired against the abrasive Pesci, "8 Heads in a Duffel Bag" might have had real spark. As is, it's a modest diversion that delivers only a half-full (or half-empty) load of comic cargo.—Kim Williamson

ANACONDA ★★

Starring Jennifer Lopez, Ice Cube, Jon Voight and Eric Stoltz. Directed by Luis Llosa. Written by Hans Bauer and Jim Cash & Jack Epps, Jr. Produced by Verna Harrah, Leonard Rabinowitz and Carole Little. A Columbia release. Adventure/horror. Rated PG-13 for intense adventure violence, and for brief language and sensuality. Running time: 90 min.

Every preconceived notion audiences might have about "Anaconda" is correct. This supposed serpentine shocker features doomed adventurers wading through murky water while a deadly snake nears and "Jaws"-like music throbs. Supporting characters die in a predictable sequence; there's a bad guy with a foreign accent, and the requisite romance of handsome hunk with shapely babe.

But scary this movie isn't. The faux serpent looks wholly unrealistic as it zips through water and air like a Saturday morning cartoon character. And such schlocky touches as its penchant for regurgitation are more gross (and funny) than frightening. Director Luis Llosa ("The Specialist") shot the film in Brazil, and the tropical setting imbues it with much-needed authenticity and cinematic richness. Llosa advances the story at an absorbing clip that never bores the audience, and he wisely eschews any high-minded discourse about good and evil. As cheesy, predictable horror flicks go, "Anaconda" squeezes considerable life from its limited aspirations.—Ian Hodder

CADILLAC RANCH ★

Starring Christopher Lloyd, Suzy Amis and Caroleen Feeney. Directed by Lisa Gottlieb. Written by Jennifer Cecil. Produced by J. Todd Harris and Harvey Kahn. A Legacy release. Comedy. Rated R for language and some nudity. Run time: 103 min.

Playing onscreen like a low-rent "Thelma & Louise," with three sisters on the run from a sadistic lawman, Jennifer Cecil's first screenplay exhibits neither the flair nor the feminism that fueled that 1991 movie. In their place, Cecil gives her grown women a terminal father fixation that proves a poor engine to drive the plot.

This BMG Independents effort—produced by "Denise Calls Up's" J. Todd Harris—should have been a showcase for actresses, but it turns into an emoting fest. The blame appears to lie less with director Lisa Gottlieb ("Across the Moon"), who at least keeps matters moving, than with Cecil, whose script approach is to give the actors lots to blab about. Black-and-white flashbacks repeat ad nauseum. Only sexy Amis shows some winning fire.—Carole Glines

BREATHING ROOM ★1/2

Starring Susan Floyd and Dan Futterman. Directed by Jon Sherman. Written by Tom Hughes and Jon Sherman. Produced by Tim Perell. An Arrow release. Romantic comedy. Rated R for language and some sexuality. Running time: 90 min.

The lame humor and artificial characterizations in "Breathing Room" undercut the film's intended truth and poignance. Perhaps if the roles were not so cute and arch in their imbecility, or so eager to please the audience, Jon Sherman's well-meaning romantic comedy might have charmed; as is, aimless and forced riffs combining the influences of Woody Allen and Albert Brooks (and even Alan Alda) try too hard.

Lead actress Susan Floyd has an appealingly perky personality—if not much warmth or spontaneity—as a single New Yorker whose relationship with her live-in boyfriend (a bland Dan Futterman) is falling apart. They decide to separate for a month as a test; the balance of the film consists of ambling, contrived dialogues with relatives, friends and potential lovers as the couple try to find love and happiness elsewhere. Predictably, they don't, and most of the conversations are of the ersatz group-therapy variety, delivered by enthusiastic amateurs who act as though they had the IQs of rabbits.—Dale Winogura

THAT OLD FEELING ★★★

Starring Bette Midler, Dennis Farina, Paula Marshall and Danny Nucci. Directed by Carl Reiner. Written by Leslie Dixon. Produced by Leslie Dixon and Bonnie Bruckheimer. A Universal release. Comedy. Rated PG-13 for language and sex-related material. Running time: 105 min.

Thankfully not the "First Wives Club" redux one might expect, "That Old Feeling" instead celebrates the firepower of a reignited old flame, here actress Lilly (Bette Midler) and author Dan (Dennis Farina) as a divorced couple who reunite at the wedding of daughter Molly (Paula Marshall).

Lilly and Dan agree to part ways, but they soon realize "that old feeling" is still there and end up in bed again. Spurned spouses discover the infidelities; the paramours escape to be alone. What follows is a hit-and-miss combination of humorous hijinks and predictable romantic entanglements. It seems that Lilly, Dan and Molly have all married cartoonishly unlikable spouses, which conveniently frees them for other pursuits. Lilly and Dan push their (annoyingly) uptight daughter towards a rough-around-the-edges but good-hearted paparazzo (Danny Nucci). Meanwhile, the cuckolded counterparts engage in increasingly preposterous behavior. It's all goofy, but adequately amusing, thanks mostly to scenery-chewer Midler.—Christine James

THE SAINT ★★1/2

Starring Val Kilmer, Elisabeth Shue and Rade Serbedzija. Directed by Phillip Noyce. Written by Jonathan Hensleigh and Wesley Strick. Produced by David Brown, Robert Evans, William J. MacDonald and Mace Neufeld. A Paramount release. Rated PG-13 for action violence, brief strong language, some sensuality and drug content. Running time: 117 min.

"The Saint," based on the popular novel series (by Leslie Charteris) that inspired a Roger Moore-starring TV show, follows the whirlwind adventures of the James Bond-like character who uses the names of Catholic saints as his aliases. In this incarnation, Templar (Val Kilmer) is hired by a Russian billionaire and wannabe czar, Ivan Tretiak ("Broken English's" Rade Serbedzija), to steal a cold-fusion formula.

His target: a beautiful and hopelessly romantic scientist, Emma Russell ("Leaving Las Vegas'" Elisabeth Shue, in her most charming Catholic schoolgirl outfits). But Templar's perfect plan goes awry when the devil-may-care playboy finds himself falling for Emma. Soon the Russian gangsters, led by Tretiak's son Ilya (Valery Nikolaev), are after both of them as the Soviet Union races to the brink of another revolution.

It's easy to see why the enigmatic Kilmer picked The Saint—given its opportunities to mix a dashing leading man franchise with a character who gets to dress up and play-act a variety of extreme disguises—over the rubber-encrusted Batman. It was a good move. The chemistry between Kilmer and Shue sparks the first part, but the film fizzles under the weight of a plodding, frustrating mess disguised as a plot. The script is a mixed bag of pseudo-politics, intriguing ideas and romantic mishmash. Noyce has a certain flair for creating tension and inventing a lot of sound and fury, but he lacks the light touch that "The Saint" needs.—Susan Lambert

INVENTING THE ABBOTTS ★★

Starring Liv Tyler, Joaquin Phoenix, Billy Crudup, Jennifer Connelly and Joanna Going. Directed by Pat O'Connor. Written by Ken Hixon. Produced by Ron Howard, Brian Grazer and Janet Myers. A Fox release. Drama. Rated R for sexuality and language. Running time: 105 min.

It's 1957; the Abbotts are the richest family in a small Illinois town and have three beautiful daughters. Jacey ("Sleepers'" Billy Crudup) and Doug Holt ("To Die For's" Joaquin Phoenix) are much lower on the social scale; they live with their widowed mother ("Article 99's" Kathy Baker), a teacher. Jacey is obsessed with the Abbotts; he believes the girls' strict father (Will Patton) became rich from a patent of the Holts' dead father, so Jacey aims to get even by becoming involved with the uninhibited middle daughter Eleanor ("Mulholland Falls'" Jennifer Connelly) and later Alice ("Wyatt Earp's" Joanna Going), the eldest. Less social, Doug is slow to realize that Pam ("Stealing Beauty's" Liv Tyler), the youngest Abbott, is in love with him.

Period detailing sharply contrast the lives of the Holt and Abbott families, and this re-creation of the repressive atmosphere of that era is far more successful than is Ken Hixon's script (based on a Sue Miller story). The young actors all give strong performances. But director Pat O'Connor ("Circle of Friends") has given this film a very slow pace yet still manages to include every romantic movie cliche.—Ed Scheid

DOUBLE TEAM ★★★★

Starring Jean-Claude Van Damme, Dennis Rodman and Mickey Rourke. Directed by Tsui Hark. Written by Don Jakoby and Paul Mones. Produced by Moshe Diamant. A Columbia release. Action/adventure. Rated R for nonstop action violence. Running time: 93 min.

Jean-Claude Van Damme, the workhorse Kickboxer/Romancer, has accomplished something bright, wild and unusual. By starring in their films, he has assisted three famed Hong Kong directors to enter the American market: John Woo with "Hard Target," Ringo Lam with "Maximum Risk" and now Tsui Hark with "Double Team." That alone is a feat of merit and significance. And in his latest "double teaming"—or triple-teaming, if one includes media name/NBA player Dennis Rodman, who co-stars—Van Damme has facilitated a piece of cinematic poetry for his global audience.

In his first stateside production (shot in Europe with an international crew), Tsui has retained a good portion of the style he's famous for—and he's extended it. With the help of cinematographer Peter Pau (Woo's "The Killer"), Tsui uses complex camera and lab work: reverse zooms, step printing, different film speeds, kaleidoscopic angles, and closeups. Edited by Bill Pankow ("Maximum Risk") and containing split-second edits, "Double Team" never stays still. It's one of the fastest collages of storytelling images to surface in an American film and contains an amusement park sequence of pure speed, color and image. As in a poem, the line ends don't meet to form a sentence, but the meaning is clear.

Though the plot leaks, the three leads bail it out. Also of note is a stunningly swift and adept martial arts fight sequence with action choreographer Xin Xin Xiong. Extra connective tissue is provided in this Mandalay/One Story effort by a smart and eclectic score by Gary Chang.—Karen Achenbach

THE 6TH MAN ★★★1/2

Starring Marlon Wayans and Kadeem Hardison. Directed by Randall Miller. Written by Christopher Reed and Cynthia Carle. Produced by David Hoberman. A Buena Vista release. Comedy. Rated PG-13 for brief language and some innuendos. Running time: 108 min.

When brothers Antoine ("Vampire in Brooklyn's" Kadeem Hardison) and Kenny Tyler ("Don't Be a Menace's..." Marlon Wayans) played basketball as kids, they had dreams of making it to the NCAA finals. Before they have a chance to make their fantasy a reality, Antoine dies. Confused and alone, Kenny—and his Washington Huskies teammates—must fight on. But, in response to a wish Kenny makes, Antoine's ghost appears, ready to help the team.

"The 6th Man's" underlying story deals with learning to say goodbye to someone who you really love and who you thought would always be there. As the narrative unfolds, the emotional bond between brothers is both demonstrated and tested. In a nice character-arc payoff, when the natural-born leader of the two, Antoine, goes too far, Kenny is forced to take charge. For many of the roles, the filmmakers found it easier to teach real players how to act rather than teach actors how to play ball, and their gamble pays off. Also, compared to many sports films, "The 6th Man" has a lot more competition scenes, and they are effectively portrayed.—Dwayne E. Leslie

B.A.P.S. ★

Starring Halle Berry and Martin Landau. Directed by Robert Townsend. Written by Troy Beyer. Produced by Mark Burg and Loretha Jones. A New Line release. Comedy. Rated PG-13 for brief strong language. Running time: 87 min.

Even with gold teeth, prehensile fingernails, whipped cream blonde hair and a squeeze-tight orange plastic jumpsuit, Halle Berry is beautiful. Beyond that, "B.A.P.S." (Black American Princesses) is amateurish and silly. What is meant to be a funny fairytale trip about the quest for a pot of gold, following two Georgia waitresses (Berry and Natalie Desselle) who take high hopes to Hollywood, stumbles through scenes. The jokes generate no laughs, leaving the actors looking foolish.

Oscar winner Martin Landau ("Ed Wood") and Ian Richardson ("Brazil") are trapped in character cliches. The heart of the story (about how cross-cultural encounters can be worthwhile) only presumably underlies Troy Beyer's script. At the helm, director Robert Townsend ("Meteor Man") has made a film for which the adjectives "inert," "unfocused" and "foolish" do battle for the descriptive crown. Together, they combine to make this film B.A.D.—Bridget Byrne

CATS DON'T DANCE ★★★

Voices by Scott Bakula, Jasmine Guy, Natalie Cole, Ashley Peldon, Kathy Najimy, John Rhys-Davies, George Kennedy, Rene Auberjonois, Hal Holbrook and Don Knotts. Directed by Mark Dindal. Written by Roberts Gannaway, Cliff Ruby, Elana Lesser and Theresa Pettengill. Produced by David Kirschner and Paul Gertz. A Warner Bros. release. Animated. Rated G. Running time: 75 min.

The latest from producer David Kirschner ("The Pagemaster") has a number of marketable elements to attract families and children: a wonderfully overrealized Golden-Era Hollywood setting, a pleasing (at times fabulously so) palette, six tuneful Randy Newman songs, a zing-bing narrative flow, and attractive leads (no hunchbacks here). The late Gene Kelly even helped design sparkling choreography.

On the downside, "Cats Don't Dance" isn't as personal a film as Kirschner's "The Pagemaster," and that takes away from its (however feline) humanity. Although its 1939 Tinseltown setting and occasional caricature appearances (Gable, Davis et al.) and its gotta-be-a-star wishes will be familiar to adults, children might be a bit lost.

"Cats Don't Dance" is released with an eight-minute, G-rated Looney Tune short, "Pullet Surprise." The Foghorn Leghorn starrer from Chuck Jones Prods. doesn't add anything to the Warner cartoon canon, and as always the vocal stylings of Mel Blanc are much missed.—Kim Williamson

TURBO ★1/2

Starring Jason David Frank, Johnny Yong Bosch, Nakia Burrise, Catherine Sutherland, Blake Foster and Hilary Shepard Turner. Directed by David Winning and Shuki Levy. Written by Shuki Levy and Shell Danielson. Produced by Jonathan Tzachor. A Fox release. Action. Rated PG for non-stop fantasy action violence. Running time: 100 min.

It's not a sequel or a continuation of an episode of the #1-rated children's TV show. "Turbo" is just what its subtitle says: "A Power Ranger Movie." The only link is that it has all the show's Power Rangers.

After a turbo-charged credit sequence, the film quickly downshifts audience enthusiasm. Perhaps parental complaints about violence are the cause, but this "Turbo" is an hour old before the rock-em sock-em begins. In its place are lots of rock music, fireworks-frill teleportations, a morphing scene and giant-headed aliens. In the first film, the zords were shiny and had a liquid-metal look; this time, they're just wannabe turbo cars with no special weapons. A climactic Mega-Turbo Zord battle scene looks like excess footage from the small-screen show. This "Turbo" arrives running on empty.—Dwayne E. Leslie

TOUCH ★1/2

Starring Bridget Fonda, Christopher Walken, Skeet Ulrich and Tom Arnold. Directed and written by Paul Schrader. Produced by Lila Cazes and Fida Attieh. An MGM release. Comedy/drama. Rated R for some sexuality, language and a scene of violence. Running time: 97 min.

A mess of religious satire, semi-serious theology, black comedy and romantic drama, "Touch" never develops its provocative ideas. Using some of his Calvinist upbringing, in which people are either predestined for salvation or not, writer/director Paul Schrader (last heard from with 1992's "Light Sleeper") has resurfaced with sloppy storytelling and loose craftsmanship that turn his thesis into a bland gruel.

In a story of fake and real faith healing, a central conflict between materialism and spirituality isn't dramatized with sincerity or insight. Instead, Schrader piles on offbeat cinematic touches, elliptical transitions and dialogues that drone toward aimlessness. His cold, cerebral approach to characters fails to define them in any meaningful way.

In dealing with matters of true vs. bogus faith, Schrader is trying to make a personal statement, using Elmore Leonard's book of the same name as a springboard. But, unlike Schrader's best films ("Hardcore" and "Patty Hearst"), he doesn't strike a balance between realism and stylization, or take enough chances in examining complex human behavior.—Dale Winogura

LICENSED TO KILL ★★★1/2

Directed, written and produced by Arthur Dong. A Deep Focus release. Documentary. Unrated. Running time: 79 min.

A grim, sober and succinct glimpse into diseased human minds, "Licensed to Kill" does not judge the seven convicted criminals candidly interviewed here. Instead, it urgently tries to understand the causes of their illegal act: gay bashing.

Without narration or facile commentary, filmmaker Arthur Dong—who directs, scripts, produces and edits—insightfully and sensitively examines how fear and self-hatred can make a killer. His film's devastating impact is enhanced by a vivid use of video for the interviews, courtroom proceedings and police investigations. The work's one major flaw: gratuitous gory shots of victims at crime scenes, which serve only to bludgeon the point. Still, a more honest and ruthless study of homophobia has not been made yet.—Dale Winogura

TANGO FEROZ ★1/2

Starring Fernan Miras and Cecilia Dopazo. Directed by Marcelo Pineyro. Written by Aida Bortnik and Marcelo Pineyro. Produced by Claudio Pustelnik and Katrina Bayonas. A Tara release. Drama. Spanish-language; English subtitles. Unrated. Running time: 108 min.

Ferocity and passion are key ingredients missing from a plodding and listless biography of the popular Argentine rock singer Jose Alberto Cruz (aka Tango) from the late 1960s to his untimely death in 1972. As portrayed by Fernan Miras, this would-be rebel mainly mopes about, has impersonal sex with his girlfriend (Cecilia Dopazo), talks aimlessly about nothing in particular, and endures dreary prison life with a friendly cellmate whose dialogues are even more numbingly self-important than are Tango's.

Even mental-hospital scenes lack their intended sense of cruelty and injustice because of the languid and downbeat moviemaking. The existential despair and disconnected dramatic structure of the writing are compounded by the uninspired vision and monotonic rhythm of Marcelo Pineyro's direction. —Dale Winogura

KIDS OF SURVIVAL ★★★1/2

Starring Tim Rollins. Directed and produced by Daniel Geller and Dayna Goldfine. A Geller/Goldfine release. Documentary. Unrated. Running time: 87 min.

Inspiring and affecting but not overly manipulative, "Kids of Survival" (subtitled "The Art and Life of Tim Rollins & K.O.S.") sensitively deals with personal and financial problems of education and how today's youth can be empowered by a caring, compassionate teacher. Tim Rollins' class of 10 teenagers in a South Bronx school is scrupulously depicted in matter-of-fact cinema verite as they work together to create unique paintings, using classic works of literature like Stephen Crane's "The Red Badge of Courage" and George Orwell's "Animal Farm" as artistic inspiration and canvas.

The difficulties of teaching such troubled and/or learning-impaired children are squarely confronted by directors Dan Geller and Dayna Goldfine, with occasional visits to their subjects' homes. They make the vital therapeutic connection between art and life with uplifting perceptions, but the video technique they employ tends to be a bit too prosaic to reach into the souls of these special people. It's a small flaw, but a significant one.—Dale Winogura

A TRUE AMERICAN ★1/2

Starring Dwight Martin, Juvencio Gonzalez Jr. and Garnet Miller. Directed, written and produced by Paul Roberts. A Roberts Cinema release. Thriller. Unrated. Running time: 99 min.

Poor production, editing and acting clouds this otherwise interesting micro-budget spy thriller. In a feature film debut for the writer/director/producer, Paul Roberts has assembled a cast of unknowns to portray a group of high-level CIA analysts who meet to decide how to handle a life-threatening situation involving widespread radioactive contamination of the food chain.

The tale could be compelling, but—with a budget of a mere $25,000—Roberts has skimped on some important production necessities. "A True American" is a B movie, though it aspires to more.—Pat Kramer

NATIONAL NEWS

OCTOBERFEST FOR UNIVERSAL; LIVE STILL KICKING; TRIMARK R.I.P.?

Universal Pictures will acquire a majority interest in October Films, ending much speculation about the future of the well-regarded indie. The deal not only gives Universal the specialized division it's been looking for, but strengthens October's position on the international front and provides some very deep pockets to reach into. October, valued at about $40 million, is privately held by a group of Wall Street investors. Its recent critical and commercial successes with "Secrets & Lies" and "Breaking the Waves" made it a hot property. The deal, which resembles the Disney acquisition of Miramax some years back, provides for continuing autonomy for October's executives. October will maintain its headquarters in New York and continue to acquire, create, market and distribute its films theatrically, both domestically and internationally. Universal will control video distribution, television rights and other ancillary markets on October's films.

The agreement ends an attempt by a Boston-based investment firm, Bain Capital Partners, to create a three-way merger among Live Entertainment, October Pictures and Trimark Holdings that would have resulted in a $200 million mega-indie. It remains to be seen whether Bain will try for a two-way merger since it appears to have agreed to acquire Live Entertainment—in the midst of a long-running IRS audit—for $93 million. Live chairman Roger Burlage reportedly had preferred a refinancing proposal of Canyon Partners, a Los Angeles-based investment partnership; under Canyon, Burlage would have run Live on its current business plan, which is to further develop a production and distribution arm. Interestingly enough, Burlage once ran Trimark, which has seen its stock, literally and figuratively, fall in recent months. Stock prices went from $6.25 in January to $3.37 in April. Early-year release "Meet Wally Sparks" bombed badly at the boxoffice, taking in just $4 million on an outlay by Trimark estimated at $15 million to $20 million for acquisition and P&A. Insiders say Chase Securities, Trimark's lead banker, has been seeking a buyer for the indie, which is valued at $45 million, including debt.

INDIE MINORS FOR MAJORS

A recent study led by John Nendick, a partner in Andersen's Global Communications and Entertainment Group, emphasized the positive for the future of independent films. The study showed the independent film industry was strong and getting stronger, saying that independents would continue to flourish under relationships forged with large companies and studios that look to the smaller, outsider companies for product. Plus, the studios view the indies as a talent "training ground"—much like the way baseball uses minor leagues to nurture talent for the majors. The study noted that 48 percent of 1996 releases were independent films, but it also acknowledged the increase in overall releases made it harder for a small film to find and, more importantly, build on its audience because the turnover rate in theatres is so high.

INDIES, INDIES EVERYWHERE AND NOT A DROP TO DRINK

In preparation for our August Independent/Specialty Market film report, this edition of National News takes a fast look at a growing and rather disturbing trend among some fixtures in the specialized film scene. Despite the recent triumph of specialty movies at the Oscars and a flood of press on the renaissance of independent film, many of the less fortunate companies and/or studio divisions devoted to the creation of "niche" titles are having an increasingly hard time gaining market share. This is having the expected effect, with some major suppliers of recent years feeling the pinch and even teetering on the edge of collapse.

Here's a fast, quick snapshot of major recent developments:

THE LION POUNCES

Desiring to increase its Wall Street appeal, MGM has agreed to acquire Orion Pictures, Goldwyn Entertainment and Motion Picture Corp. of America from John Kluge's Metromedia Entertainment Group. The $573 million price represents a cash payment of $373 million (coming from MGM's co-owners, Kirk Kerkorian's Tracinda Corp. and Australian broadcaster Seven Network) and $200 million in debt assumption. The buy bolsters MGM's library holdings—which, as a primary asset in Hollywood valuations, would make an expected stock offering by the studio more attractive. MGM owns the United Artists titles, but the company under Kerkorian's first reign sold all pre-1987 MGM films to Ted Turner. Metromedia's library adds 2,200 titles to MGM's 1,559-film vault. Metromedia retains control of the Landmark arthouse circuit.

SONY TERMINATES TRIUMPH

While other studios are looking to create or acquire indie arms, Sony Pictures Entertainment will be shutting its down. After four years of operating it, Sony will dissolve low-budget arm Triumph once the current slate of films are completed. Sony president and COO John Calley said the move was strategic rather than financial and was intended to focus energies on Columbia and TriStar. Born during former president Peter Guber's tenure, Triumph has had an uneven boxoffice record. President of Triumph since 1993, David Saunders said the division should not be shut down, insisting every Triumph movie has ultimately made its money back and then some after video and TV revenues were counted. He is expected to remain at Triumph until 1998, when the last six Triumph films in the works will be released. Triumph's latest releases are "Truth or Consequences, N.M." and "Masterminds."

CUTS AT CASTLE ROCK

The ripple effect of the Time Warner/Turner merger continues. The latest boat to be tossed is Castle Rock Entertainment, which will lay off all but 40 to 55 of its 117 employees. The cuts were expected and come in departments that have overlapping responsibilities with Warner Bros., the Time Warner arm that next year begins distributing Castle Rock productions, which will average five films annually.

Turner Broadcasting System bought Castle Rock three years ago and beefed up the staff. It was readying the company to be part of a new studio Ted Turner was aiming to create by combining Castle Rock, New Line and the now-defunct Turner Pictures. Castle Rock production president Liz Glotzer will remain in her post. Likewise, feature and TV development will be unaffected, as will any development deals actors and directors have with Castle Rock. The company's domestic distribution deal with Sony Pictures Entertainment expires this year. Currently, Castle Rock's foreign distribution is handled through joint ventures with overseas companies: Concord in Germany, UGC in France and Rank in the UK.

NEW LINE NOT FOR SALE

In a related Time Warner story, the media giant has finally, after many talks and much effort to find a buyer for New Line Cinema, taken the company off the market. This comes despite Ted Turner's reported desire to sell and the clear indication that New Line chairman Bob Shaye won't settle for anything less than full autonomy. Though the company will be staying with Time Warner for now, talks have begun with banks to arrange off-balance production financing in order to keep New Line costs off the Time Warner books.

Under the original New Line/Turner deal, New Line was guaranteed independence. Not so with Time Warner. Both New Line and Castle Rock still officially report to Turner, but with $500 million needed to make its upcoming slate of films—including the big-budget sci-fi extravaganza "Lost in Space," set for an April '98 release—New Line needs cash. If provided by Time Warner, Warner Bros. co-chairmen Bob Daly and Terry Semel might be able to call the shots at the former indie.

New Line might have looked better to buyers if Shaye were willing to return to making the lower-budget films that first put New Line on the map, but Shaye prefers a range of budgets. Turner, who acquired New Line in 1993 for $570 million, wanted to sell for a high price (up to $1 billion). New Line's recent track record and Turner's desire to turn a profit seemed to have combined to make it impossible for New Line to find a buyer.

But the situation remains fluid. New Line's upcoming slate includes "Austin Powers: International Man of Mystery," "Boogie Nights" and "Mortal Kombat: Annihilation"—all of which are contenders for breakout success.

PACIFIC OVERTURES

NOTES FROM THE PACIFIC RIM by Susan Lambert

LEAD STORY: CHINA OPENS THEATRE DOORS TO FOREIGN INVESTMENT

BEIJING—China wants to update its theatres and reinvigorate its cinema-going audience, but according to Zhou Ming, an official of the Film Industry Administration, the country can't afford to go it alone. That is why the notoriously closed country is taking the first steps toward inviting foreign investors to have a piece of local development. The government says it will soon publish foreign investment guidelines and is looking to bring in outside money to support the country's struggling domestic film industry. In the past, the Chinese government has avoided foreign participation and been leery of imported films—seen as dangerous propaganda—to the degree of allowing only 12 films per year into the country for general circulation. According to existing laws, local cinemas must show Chinese-made films on at least two-thirds of their screens. The government has no plans to change that limitation at the moment, and foreign investors will be limited to minority stakes in properties. Many companies, eager to get a foothold in the vast underscreened market that is China, are encouraged by the move, saying that it's a small step in the right direction. China will be offering an opportunity to invest in several urban markets: Beijing, Shanghai and Western Chongqing. Mike Conners, a Motion Picture Association spokesman based in Singapore, says some foreign companies are already investing in cinemas through local Chinese companies. Hong Kong-based Lark International Enterprises plans to open an eight-screen multiplex on the mainland in July as part of a deal it has with United Artists Theatre Circuit. Also, Singapore-based Singapore Technologies Industrial Corp. and Golden Harvest Multiplex are partnering to build Shanghai's first multiplex, a 1,300-seat sixplex.

MORRIS LEAVES FFC, HOYTS EXPANDS ABROAD

SYDNEY—John Morris, chief executive of the Australian Film Finance Corp. (FFC), has decided to leave the agency on June 30 when his contract expires. The FFC is Queensland's principal funding agency, and during Morris' eight-year term it invested in such films as "Shine," "Strictly Ballroom" and "Muriel's Wedding." FFC chairman Bob Campbell praised Morris for successfully steering the corporation through its third government review, which confirmed the success of FFC's direct subsidy to the film industry. It is speculated that FCC will look for Morris' replacement at other state film agencies or even within its own ranks. One possible candidate is FFC senior investment manager Catriona Hughes.

In other Australian news, Hoyts Cinemas, which is expanding its international presence, has promoted two executives. Neil Pentecost, operations manager for New South Wales and Queensland, headed to Santiago, Chile in May to become general manager of Hoyts' new operation there; and Hoyts executive Stuart McInnes now moves to London as general manager of operations in the United Kingdom and Europe.

HONG KONG PRODUCERS FACE CHINESE CENSORS

HONG KONG—Hong Kong producers and directors are breathing a little easier these days now that it looks like China may allow studios to release two versions of their films: one for distribution in Hong Kong and one for mainland theatres. The managing director for Media Asia Group, Ma Fung-kwok, hopes it is a sign that artistic freedom will be protected in Hong Kong when it reverts to Chinese rule on July 1. Ma Fung-kwok is a member of the Beijing-based Provisional Legislature that will take over from Hong Kong's elected body when the transition occurs. Chinese authorities regularly practice censorship on mainland films through a committee of a dozen or so bureaucrats, which must approve all films before distribution. Ng See-yuen, chairman of the Hong Kong Film awards and managing director of Seasonal Film Corp., recently produced a controversial historical drama "The Soong Sisters" (see review, this issue). A story of the powerful wives of three Chinese leaders, it also had to gain approval of a separate committee of historians. Ng See-yuen is pleased that, although there were cuts made to satisfy the censors, many controversial scenes survived intact. But another Hong Kong producer, Manfred Wong, says he has faced difficulties gaining approval by Chinese authorities to film his script "Wind and Cloud" on the mainland because the film follows an anti-hero and Beijing doesn't like the ambiguity of the story.

TEMASEK REAPS GOLDEN HARVEST

SINGAPORE—A signing ceremony was held in April to celebrate the creation of a US$30 million film fund company, GH Pictures Limited, which will invest in films produced in China. The agreement is between Hong Kong's Golden Harvest (through World Media Group Ltd.); Citicorp Capital Asia Ltd.; and Television Corporation of Singapore/Temasek Holdings Limited. GH Pictures will support movie production projects approved by the Peoples Republic of China and the Ministry of Radio and Film TV, and all movies produced by the fund will be distributed through Golden Harvest Films. Golden Harvest chairman Raymond Chow says the company plans to tap international capital and resources to help support China's film industry. Lee Cheok Yew, CEO of Television Corporation of Singapore, says the venture is a natural development for TCS after 15 years of producing TV serials, specials and movies.

VIETNAM GUARANTEES INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY PROTECTION

HANOI—An agreement was reached in late April between Vietnam and the United States that for the first time guarantees protection of intellectual property in Vietnam. MPAA head Jack Valenti hailed it as a tremendous development in the war against piracy. The piracy of movies and videos, along with books, musical recordings and video games, threatens the potential for U.S. exports in Vietnam with an estimated $50 million in trade losses each year. Vietnam is one of the fastest-growing markets in the world.

The agreement is considered a good step toward improved U.S.-Vietnam trade relations, but in order for Vietnam to become a member of the World Trade Organization it still must adopt a number of international conventions, including the Bern Convention, that protect intellectual property and other trade.

EXHIBITION BRIEFINGS

MUVICO'S MEMPHIS BELLE

Muvico Theatres plans to build what will be the largest multiplex in Memphis, Tenn. The state-of-the-art complex, set to open in late 1998, will have 23 auditoriums as well as a 400- to 500-seat IMAX 3D theatre. The cinema will offer stadium seating, digital sound systems, wall-to-wall curved screens, gourmet concessions and specially designed seats created for Muvico, which feature moveable armrests and lumbar support for added comfort. Muvico currently operates 61 screens throughout Florida, with 117 screens in various stages of development throughout the southeastern United States, the Caribbean and South America.

EVERYTHING'S COMING UP ROSEVILLE FOR UATC

United Artists Theatre Circuit has opened the Olympus Pointe 12 Theatre in Roseville, Calif. "We feel the Roseville community has been underserved by the exhibition industry in providing a quality motion picture experience," says Neal Pinsker, vice president of operations for the Western District. "The residents of Roseville will now experience the power of THX sound, digital processing, wall-to-wall screens, cupholder armrests and exemplary customer service." The Olympus Pointe 12 features DTS and SDDS, with THX in two auditoriums; automated ticketing; wheelchair seating dispersed throughout all auditoriums; assistive listening devices; and a state-of-the-art video wall in the lobby that plays coming attractions.

DICKINSON GIVES OKLA. PATRONS MOORE FOR THEIR MONEY

Dickinson Theatres is constructing a 12-screen theatre in Moore, Okla., in what is the first of several Oklahoma builds the circuit is planning. The Moore 12 will feature giant wall-to-wall screens, stadium seating, high-back rocker seats with cupholder armrests, and Dolby, DTS and SDDS sound systems. A centrally-located computerized boxoffice will facilitate both same-day and advance ticket sales.

METROPOLITAN'S DESERT OASIS

Metropolitan Theatres Corp. will add 32 screens in the Coachella Valley, a desert region in California, according to Bruce Corwin, the circuit's president. "Never before has Metropolitan undertaken an expansion project of such magnitude," says Corwin. "We are extremely excited for our desert patrons, who will now have the opportunity to truly experience the finest our industry has to offer in film presentation. All of our new facilities will offer stadium seating and state-of-the-art projection and digital sound." With previously announced expansion plans, including a 10-plex in Calexico, Calif., Metropolitan will operate 77 screens in the Coachella and Imperial Valleys, bringing the chain's total count to 151 screens throughout California and Colorado.

NATIONAL AMUSEMENTS UPS MASS IN MASS.

National Amusements is increasing its Showcase Cinemas in Revere, Mass. by expanding it to 18 screens and 5,800 seats, making it the largest cinema complex in New England. The renovated cinema will have multiple boxoffices with 12 or more ticket-selling stations; a full-service customer service center; a cinema store selling movie merchandise; a video wall showing trailers; and an entertainment center with video games.

CLARIFICATION

In the article "Palace Guard" (April 1997), BOXOFFICE incorrectly stated that Mann Theatres owns the Village and Bruin Theatres in Westwood, Calif. Charles Skouras, president of National Theatres for many years, obtained the theatres in the 1930s, and they are still owned by the Skouras family. Mann Theatres has been a tenant since 1973.

CONCESSIONS EXTRA: LOEWS FLUSH WITH ICEE SLUSH

Coca-Cola-owned National ICEE Corp., manufacturer of ICEE frozen carbonated beverages, has announced that Loews Theatres (formerly Sony Theatres) has agreed to introduce ICEE at all of its theatres. According to ICEE, Loews conducted taste tests with other frozen carbonated beverage brands, the results of which affirmed ICEE's popularity with consumers. Additionally, ICEE cites a research study in which 40 percent of teens surveyed mentioned ICEE by name as a drink they would buy. Among ICEE's marketing initiatives are new promotional cup designs, an updated logo (still featuring ICEE's polar bear mascot), and tie-ins with sports, entertainment and educational properties. Popular with the kids are Bear Paw Points, which are available on ICEE cups and can be redeemed for ICEE merchandise such as caps, T-shirts and beach towels.

Q&A: NAC REINVENTS PUBLICATIONS

Susan Cross, director of communications for the National Association of Concessionaires, tells Boxoffice about the complete revamping of the NAC's two publications. With new features, more information and an attractive new design, Cross believes Concessionworks and Concession Profession will both be valuable tools to everyone in the concessions industry.

Boxoffice: The NAC has reworked its quarterly newsletter, and is starting a new biannual magazine. What are these publications going to be like?

SUSAN CROSS: This all came about because we did a readership survey, and we asked our members what they wanted in our publications. They told us they wanted more, and they wanted it to be snappier and brighter. The newsletter used to be called The Concessionaire, and it was basically a two-color [newsletter with] information about the NAC. The frequency has changed from time to time—it was a monthly, then it was quarterly, then it was a bimonthly. We've changed the name to Concessionworks, and it's now a quarterly four-color publication. It includes information about the association and our members, as well as feature articles on topics that our members are interested in. The first issue just came out in March.

Boxoffice: What are some of the articles that appeared in the first issue?

CROSS: The first issue had an article about the Internet and the World Wide Web, and how you can use it in your food service or concessions business. Another article deals with Generation X in food service—how that particular age group is impacting the food service and concessions industry, both from a front-line perspective and from a management perspective.

Boxoffice: What else is contained in the newsletter?

CROSS: There was information on the convention, the trade show, registration forms; there's a product section for new products; there's a news brief section that talks about some of the things that are going on in the industry; there was an article on one of our members [Bruce Proctor of Proctor Cos.] receiving the Bert Nathan Memorial Award at ShoWest. There's a page called "Fast Facts" that has trivia items. Every issue tells you who the new members are, information on people who have changed positions or gotten promotions or have news going on in their company. Each issue also has a spotlight, where we take a member and give him a 20-questions kind of thing. It's really fun. It's a combination of fun and information.

Boxoffice: Tell me about Concession Profession, the biannual magazine.

CROSS: Concession Profession takes the place of Insite, which was a yearly trade journal we started I believe in 1980. It came out annually and included our NAC membership directory, as well as some feature articles and information about the association. But it didn't really have an identity, and it changed from year to year and it didn't really have a focus. So we decided to do away with Insite, and instead of doing a yearly trade journal/membership directory, we would do a biannual magazine that would have some consistency, that would have an identity in the industry. The spring issue will have a lot of information about our convention in it, as well as a number of feature articles and columns. The fall issue will include the membership directory, so we will keep that component of it, but it will be more magazine-oriented, and it will have a definite style and design that will be consistent. There's no magazine in food service at all that focuses specifically on concessions, and we thought that was a niche that we could fill, and fill well.

European News Notes by Melissa Morrison

LEAD STORY: LONDON MERGES FILM FESTIVALS

LONDON—An upstart challenger to the established London Film Festival (LFF) has changed tactics and joined forces with its rival to create a premier film event in the English capital. The nascent London Film '97 festival will merge with the LFF, Europe's largest noncompetitive festival, which takes place November 6-23. The elder fest will eventually take on some elements of London Film '97's concept: competitive screenings and the possible addition of a related market. The two organizations, joined by the producers group PACT (Producers' Association of Cinema and Television), will discuss plans to make the 1998 LFF a competitive, "A"-status one. Plans for the London Film '97 festival and market were announced in February by Sheila Whitaker, who had earlier been fired as the head of the LFF.

As originally planned, Whitaker's festival would have occurred in early October and would have showcased 120 to 150 movies from American studios and major international directors, just as the LFF does (although somewhat fewer than the LFF's 180). The new-and-improved festival echoes another evolving industry event: The pre-Mifed London Premiere Screenings will also occur in the fall (October 13-17), its timing placing it significantly just before the Mifed (International Film and TV Film Documentary Market) screenings in Milan, Italy (October 19-24). Previously, the London pre-Mifed screenings were more informally organized but have gradually gained importance for film buyers and sellers. This year, at the urging of UK sales companies, the screenings will be coordinated by, and resulting deals facilitated through a central liaison office. (Also on the market front, the late-summer Venice Film Festival has announced plans for the Venice International Film Market, meant to prime the palate for the main dish of Mifed.)

MEDIA II SHOWS DISTRIBS THE MONEY

BRUSSELS—A new program by MEDIA II, the audiovisual program of united Europe, will encourage foreign-film distribution in member countries by rewarding films for foreign admissions. The organization has earmarked US$12.8 million for the plan, which may begin as early as the fall. Depending on the size of the country in which the film screens, the movie will earn from US$.38 to US$.51 per ticket sold, with the advantage going to sales in smaller countries. (The limit will be 1 million admissions and the money will be returned in the form of a credit account to be used for the distributor's next film.) The program announcement accompanied news from the Paris-based International Federation of Film Distributors' Associations (FIAD), which showed that admissions for European films in countries other than the movies' home countries had dropped precipitously. In 1995, only 26.3 million foreign admissions were recorded, compared to 40.1 million the previous year—a decline of one-third. MEDIA II also announced a new screenwriters' training program, North By Northwest, to be organized by Britain's First Film Foundation, the Dutch Maurits Binger Film Institute, and Denmark's The Script. The training course will bring American "script doctors," led by David Howard, to Europe this summer and fall to advise their budding Continental counterparts.

MUCHO MULTIPLEXES

ATHENS—Greece now boasts its first multiplex, the Finns are waiting for theirs, and all of Spain will be under construction through the next year. In a suburb of Athens, the US$28.5 million Village Centre debuted in February, sporting 10 screens and an entertainment center. The cinema is the result of a joint venture between Australia's Village Roadshow and the Greek Vardinoyannis oil conglomerate. The Athens 'plex is the first of three Roadshow plans for the capital city, with four others scheduled for other towns. Finland will get its first of three Helsinki multiplexes constructed by Kino-Palatsi-Sandrews-Metronome, a collaboration among a Swedish-Danish exhibition partnership and a pair of Finnish producers. The projects include building a 1,900-seat cinema and refurbishing an existing one, the Maxim and Formia.

Finally, in Spain, Warner Bros., the pay-TV company Sogecable and the Portuguese media group Lusomundo Filmes plan to collaborate on 20 multiplexes, some with up to 16 screens, in the next four years. The first project is an eight-plex scheduled to open this summer in Zaragoza.

GREGORY'S OLD LADY

EDINBURGH—Director Bill Forsyth is postponing his much-anticipated sequel to 1981's "Gregory's Girl" in protest of the state film agency's funding procedures. He has charged the Scottish Film Fund (which determines what projects receive designated funding) with favoritism, saying that it funds its board members and other close associates at the expense of nonmembers. Forsyth joined the fund's production panel in September, but resigned in protest in January. At the time, he was in preproduction on the "Gregory" sequel, for which the fund had allotted US$1.6 million (before his appointment). Forsyth says he will seek alternatives and will likely postpone the film until 1998. A week after Forsyth's resignation, the Scottish production company Palm Tree Productions filed a similar complaint with the country's Office of Fair Trading and the European Commission, and the Scottish Arts Council announced it would undertake its own independent investigation. Soon after, John McGrath, the producer of "Carrington," resigned in protest of Forsyth's accusations. In an effort to defend the fund's integrity, McGrath said he would refuse a US$1.7 million fund grant to his production "The Silver Darlings," and said he would not request funding for his production of Kazuo Ishiguro's "A Pale View of Hills." McGrath praised the panel members as professional and fair.

Q&A: MARIANNE SAGEBRECHT GETS JURY DUTY

As the industry winds down from the Cannes Film Festival, where a jury's blessing can lift an otherwise obscure film into the international spotlight, earning it a few million dollars in the process, BOXOFFICE probes the mind of a frequent juror. German actress Marianne Sagebrecht has done jury duty at several festivals, most recently in Berlin at the 1997 Berlin Filmfestspiele. Best known to Americans for her role in 1988's "Bagdad Cafe," she's also appeared with John Malkovich in Volker Schlondorff's "The Ogre." Sagebrecht's latest project—playing Sophia Loren's "little, round" sister in "Soleil"—showed at Cannes, screening out of competition.

BOXOFFICE: What criteria do you use when you're judging a film?

MARIANNE SAGEBRECHT: For me it's very important that I try as much as I can to be with the audience. When I'm with the audience, I know exactly what the film does to the audience, how it influences the audience, what it is and how it is. And then, of course, I'm a woman. One thing is totally scaring me about all films out now. More and more in the last three years, female characters are changing completely. It looks like someone wants to tell us, leave the kitchen, take the gun and be like the man—be a soldier yourself. I think it's extreme.

BOXOFFICE: Do depictions of women affect your judgment of a film in competition?

SAGEBRECHT: Definitely. It's all very personal. What I believe—my philosophy, my religious beliefs, my social beliefs—of course, this is me and my whole life. But another thing would be the technical aspect. A good film is a good film. You have the camera, you have the technique, you have the directing, you have this and this and that. And of course you have the acting. This is something else, also very important. So you have two levels.

BOXOFFICE: Do you find that as an actress you focus more on the acting in a film?

SAGEBRECHT: No. For me, it's always everything together. It's if afterward I'm tired or destroyed, or I'm full of energy and feel happy, if something is touched and something comes together, my heart and my mind.

BOXOFFICE: How do you feel about the whole idea of ranking one movie as better than others?

SAGEBRECHT: I don't like the word "judge," it's terrible. I'd rather say, "I feel this more, I like this more." I don't like to judge so much, because I am not a filmmaker. I can go at it from a totally different level, which is good. I'm like a scout—I was there and I tell what I felt, I tell what I didn't like, what was not right for me.

BOXOFFICE: What are your thoughts on the purpose of a competition in a film festival?

SAGEBRECHT: I always say nobody forces you to take a film to a festival. I know many, many film producers and directors would say, 'No, I don't need this, I just go out and try to touch the audience.' But on the other hand, if you go out and try to touch the audience, you need a distributor and you need a cinema, the place and the chance to show your film. And this [the festival] is a special thing.

So many cinema owners, if they have, for example, eight screens in one big building, they could give one room for young films. But no, they're so focused on making a profit, and this is the worst. I think there's treasure to be found—films from young people [that never found distribution]. I'm sure one day there will be a festival devoted to films that have never been released. Then we will find something, I'm sure. I'm sure.

NORTHERN EXPOSURE

Canadian News Notes by Shlomo Schwartzberg

LEAD STORY: DREAMWORKS SEEKS PERMISSION TO SET UP TORONTO BRANCH

DreamWorks might be coming to Toronto, if the company gets permission from the Canadian government to do so. DreamWorks Distribution LLC would like to distribute its projects from a Toronto-based company, which would be called DreamWorks Distribution Canada. But that would mean getting the go-ahead to distribute directly in Canada, which currently is not allowable for any American companies but Hollywood studios whose operations in Canada pre-date the legislation. A recent attempt by Netherlands-based Polygram Filmed Entertainment to distribute directly in Canada failed to get government approval. But Jim Tharp, head of North American distribution for DreamWorks, told The Toronto Star that he hopes to get consent from Ottawa within the month. That might happen, because DreamWorks, with one of its emphases being animated films, is not threatening any Canadian distributor, and Canada is known for a strong community of artists working in animation, who could only benefit from jobs being offered by the new company. DreamWorks' first feature film, the George Clooney vehicle "Peacemaker," is scheduled for release this fall in Canada as well as the U.S.

MORE CINEPLEX PLEXES

Cineplex Odeon continues its significant expansion with announcements of three new major multiplexes in the Toronto area, representing an investment (in conjunction with the landlords) of C$41 million (US$28.3 million). The twin Varsity cinemas, one of the main venues for The Toronto International Film Festival, will be expanded by 10 screens, six of which will feature all-stadium seating. The 50,000-square-foot multiplex, which is located in downtown Toronto, is expected to be completed by this December. Cineplex will also build a 10-screen, 45,000-square-foot multiplex that will seat more than 2,400 people in Markham, Ontario, and an 11-screen, 2,280-seat multiplex in the city of Scarborough, both also scheduled to open in December of this year. Speaking to BOXOFFICE, Howard Lichtman, Cineplex's executive vice president of marketing and communications, said about the three complexes, "We're building the new theatres in Toronto because it's our home town and we want to make sure that every community within our own home territory that doesn't have a modern state-of-the-art multiplex is properly serviced." Currently, Cineplex has 1,554 screens in 314 locations in North America.

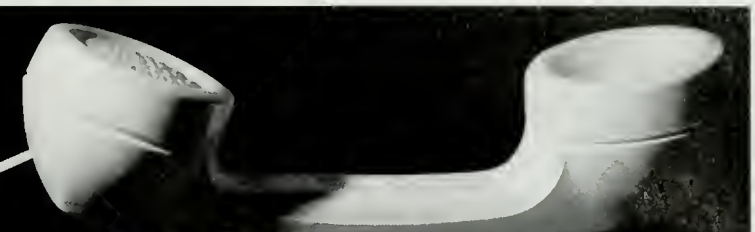
EGOYAN HOPES FOR "SWEET" SUCCESS

At press time, Atom Egoyan's latest film, "The Sweet Hereafter," was said to have been invited to the 1997 Cannes film festival. Egoyan's film, adapted from Russell Bank's book, deals with a horrific bus crash and the effect its aftermath has on a young girl ("Road to Avonlea's" Sarah Polley) who survived. "The Sweet Hereafter" would be Egoyan's second film to be invited to compete in Cannes; two of his other films, "Speaking Parts" and "The Adjuster," have played the Director's Fortnight at the fest.

CANADIAN MOVIEGOERS RENDEZ-VOUS WITH QUEBEC CINEMA

Le Rendez-Vous du Cinema Quebecois has gone on the road, bringing the best of Quebec cinema to other parts of Canada. It's been around for 15 years, showing the full output of the film year in Quebec, and now, for the second year, the top 10 Quebec films (and one short) have traveled outside the province. This year's Rendez-Vous in Toronto did considerably better than in 1996, its first year in the city, says organizer Claude Martel, because of the more central downtown venue where the films showed. Among the movies exhibited were Pierre Gang's "Sous-Sol," the Genie award winner for best original screenplay, which has also been invited to the New Directors/New Films series in New York, and Gilles Carle's "Pudding Chomeur," which had its world premiere in competition at the 1996 Montreal World Film Festival.

BELL CANADA SETS UP H@BITAT FOR FILM STUDENTS



Ana Serrano has been appointed Director of MediaLinx H@bitat, a new media training facility slated to open in June at the Canadian Film Centre, Canada's premier film school. Established with a C$500,000 (US$345,000) donation from Bell Canada, Medialinx H@bitat is a training, resource and development facility committed to "transforming" Canadian film. Workshops and familiarity with the new media should ensure that Centre graduates will be turned "into world class participants in the entertainment industry of the future," says a press release announcing the project. The Centre, which annually unveils short films from its graduates, also produces feature films; Colleen Murphy's romantic comedy "Shoemaker" comes out commercially this month, and previous Centre features include "Rude," "Blood and Donuts" and "House."

OFDC INSTITUTES INITIATIVES TO SUPPORT ONTARIO FILMMAKERS

It might be reeling from funding cuts but the Ontario Film Development Corporation is still determined to support emerging Ontario filmmakers. Its recent initiatives, Market Mentorships and Partnerships in Training, were instituted after extensive research and consultation with industry and clients. "The two new initiatives will create opportunities for the next generation of filmmakers," says Alexandra Raffe, chief executive officer of the organization. "The OFDC is in a position to forge innovative industry partnerships that will provide emerging filmmakers with direct, practical industry contact, mentorship, and professional development opportunities which will give Ontario filmmakers an edge in an increasingly aggressive marketplace." Participants in the programs will be partnered with distributors and producers at workshops held in advance of and on location at domestic and international television and film markets. MIP TV was the site of the official launch of the program and further such pairings between up-and-comers and established talent will take place at Toronto, Berlin, Cannes and the AFM, among other festivals.

Compiled by BOXOFFICE MAGAZINE. Numbers for Boxoffice Gross represent total domestic boxoffice grosses to the nearest $100,000; + signs indicate that films remain in theatrical release. Number of Screens indicates the maximum number of screens in widest, simultaneous release. Entries in the Theatrical/Video Distributor column list two names when the video releasing company is different from (or releases through a subsidiary different from) the theatrical distributor. Exact day-and-date specific entries for Home Video Release are confirmed; in all other cases, the month indicated for a release is forecast by the editors of BOXOFFICE. BOXOFFICE is not liable for errors or omissions in the chart.

The Big Picture

The era of realistic model animation for feature films came to an end last year, though few noticed. It happened when Tim Burton was putting together "Mars Attacks!" and was persuaded by test footage from Industrial Light and Magic that his plans could be better (and more cost effectively) fulfilled by the use of computer graphics imaging (CGI). Model animation had already lost dinosaur epics (thanks to "Jurassic Park") and space warfare flicks (in "ID4") to the computer terminal. When former animator Burton sided with the digital effects revolution, it was essentially the model animation equivalent of Napoleon's defeat at Waterloo.

For fans of fantastical cinema, CGI will have to work hard to erase memories of the pulse-pounding model animation tradition of Willis O'Brien and Ray Harryhausen. O'Brien, who began his work in the silent era, was perhaps the single most significant effects pioneer in movies. With 1933's "King Kong," he set standards the industry is still trying to catch up with; working with models sculpted by his lifelong associate Marcel Delgado, O'Brien blended intricate miniature work with live character footage, staged believable battles between enormous primitive beasts, and used mattes and models to create a nightmare vision of both a primeval jungle and an urban one: the overgrown rain forest of Kong's Island, and the depression-era New York City which Kong attacks and is ultimately destroyed by.

O'Brien's greatest achievement, though, may have come in Kong's close-ups, which, in their range of expression and emotion, made an inarticulate beast's strange love for a flaxen-haired flapper both believable and heart-rending. Kong's "acting" came courtesy of the intricate, frame-by-frame manipulation of an 18-inch puppet, yet it remains one of cinema's great "performances," and the standard by which all other effects-created creatures are still judged.

Interestingly, it was as O'Brien's star pupil that Ray Harryhausen first came to light. As O'Brien's "First Technician" on 1949's Kong-like "Mighty Joe Young," Harryhausen (who had earlier worked on George Pal's "Puppetoons") learned realistic model animation at the hands of its greatest practitioner. Harryhausen's later credits are like a pocket history of '50s and '60s drive-in favorites: "It Came From Beneath the Sea" (1952); "The Beast From 20,000 Fathoms" (1953); "Earth vs. the Flying Saucers" (1956); "Twenty Million Miles to Earth" (1957). Though he did his share of prehistoric creature effects, it was in films based on Greek mythology that Harryhausen found his own unique niche: His complex combination of actors and animation for the duel between live-action warriors and a platoon of sword-wielding skeletons in "Jason and the Argonauts" (1963) remains a masterpiece of animation choreography.

O'Brien passed away in November of 1962 while at work on the miniatures for Stanley Kramer's epic comedy "It's a Mad, Mad, Mad, Mad World." But Harryhausen, who is still alive, managed to "team" with O'Brien one last time. In 1969, Harryhausen provided the dinosaurs for "Valley of Gwangi," one of the many unfulfilled "dream" projects O'Brien left behind.

Unfortunately, time is money in movie work, and so the very time-consuming craft of model animation is increasingly a lost art. There is, however, at least one writer and one director who remember their movie history: Michael Crichton and Steven Spielberg, whose latest Jurassic collaboration is called "The Lost World." That title first came to the movies in 1925, when a silent feature based on Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's novel of the same name set a brontosaurus loose in Victorian London, to the amazement of audiences. Though not directly related to the Crichton/Spielberg project, the 1925 "Lost World" had certain themes in common: it was not only the first dramatic feature built around model animation but the first film about dinosaurs amok in the modern world.

That first "Lost World" unquestionably launched the genre which "The Lost World: Jurassic Park" will no doubt revivify. It also launched the career of the man who gave the movies its first viable technology for bringing such visions to the screen—a young effects artist, by the name of Willis O'Brien.—Ray Greene

FOR THE BIG SCREEN, THE CHRISTIE REFERENCE CONSOLE IS THE PROVEN LIGHT SOURCE.

The new frame of reference for large screen illumination is the Christie Reference Console.

If you want greater light distribution and brighter illumination for your 60 foot screens, without damaging film, let Christie guide the way.

The Christie Reference console shines a brilliant new light on big screen projection. You get maximum brightness and uniform distribution with less heat, thanks to our 15-inch metal reflector's unique multilayered dichroic coating, that protects the film from harmful IR energy. Push button motorized bulb alignment provides precise alignment of the lamp. And, our revolutionary pressurized plenum cooling system extends lamp life by cooling both the reflector and the bulb. Add these features to Christie's patented automatic lamp focus that accommodates both flat and scope apertures, and you'll see why the Christie Reference console is the reference point from which all others will be judged.

JBL Cinema Sound. The Sound of Yesteryear, Next Year and Every Year in Between.

Starting back in 1936, when James B. Lansing won an Academy Award for Technical Excellence, JBL has earned a legendary reputation for quality, reliability and innovation. Today, more than three-quarters of all cinema loudspeakers sold worldwide come from JBL. No other manufacturer offers as wide a range of solutions for the demands of modern cinema. That's why, from the smallest rooms to the largest, most exotic installations in the world, JBL remains... the speaker of the house.

The Samuel Goldwyn Theatre at the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences.

From stand-alones to megaplexes, always the perfect fit.

Cinema 3000 Series:

This series is designed to provide the maximum value for the minimum cost. The 3000 Series has a shallow profile cabinet and the most economical subwoofer available, making it the perfect choice where space and budgets are limited. THX Approved.

Cinema 4000 Series:

This is the industry standard for a wide variety of room sizes. These are the systems that launched the modern era of cinema sound and the ones now used in most dubbing rooms throughout the world. THX Approved.

Cinema 5000 Series:

The 5000 Series represents JBL's best cinema systems and features the most advanced loudspeaker technology for today's soundtrack requirements. This series includes new three-way systems which maximize digital sound sources, plus digital signal control for an easier set-up and more precise overall sound system control. They're perfect for showcase theaters of any size from small to medium to large.

HOLLYWOOD UPDATES

Three lawsuits have been filed against the filmmakers of TriStar's "Apt Pupil" for allegedly filming minors as young as 14 in the nude without prior notification or parental consent. Devin St. Albin, David Stockdale and Ben Scott Baker, three boys who were hired as extras for the film, claim that they were ordered to strip naked for a shower room scene, and were told that they would be fired if they did not comply. Additionally, a photographer is said to have taken indecent photographs of the boys "for no legitimate purpose related to the filming." According to St. Albin's parents, the scene was supposed to be filmed under strict supervision and with no nudity. The suit names Phoenix Pictures Inc., TriStar Pictures Inc., Sony Pictures Entertainment, Happy Endings Productions, Bad Hat Harry Productions, director Bryan Singer, producers Kenneth Kokin, Jane Hamsher and Don Murphy, and Hamsher and Murphy's production company, JD Productions. A spokesperson for Phoenix Pictures called the accusations "outrageous and completely without merit."

The times they are a-changin'—at least when it comes to that old '80s fixture, the "Rambo" franchise. Rights to the once-popular Stallone-performed musclebound Vietnam vet avenger went on the block as part of Carolco Pictures' recent bankruptcy hearing. A bidding war was expected between Miramax's Dimension Films arm and Roger Corman's Concorde/New Horizons but none materialized. The upshot: Miramax got prequel and sequel rights to a character whose adventures have grossed $250 million-plus in the U.S. alone (and at least that internationally) plus countless millions more in ancillaries for a measly $500,000. By comparison, Miramax/Dimension paid $3.15 million for the same rights to Carolco's "Total Recall" thanks to a competitive bidding environment. Other Carolco titles on the block at press time included the "Terminator" franchise and "Universal Soldier." Watch these pages for details on what happens next in the Carolco fire sale.

Anthony Edwards, who stars on the popular TV drama "ER," has entered a first-look deal with Warner Bros. to produce TV and film projects through his production company, Aviator. With producing partner Dante Di Loreto, Edwards already has several films in development, including "Us Belongs To You," a romantic comedy in which Edwards will star; "Brother Bertram," based on a comic novel about a monk who visits New York; and "Wrigleyville," a romantic comedy about two fanatic Cub devotees.

Filmmaker Chris Columbus, whose successes with 20th Century Fox include megahits "Home Alone" and "Mrs. Doubtfire," has renewed his deal with the studio for another three years. Under the deal, he will write, produce and direct films through his 1492 Pictures. Under his last pact with Fox, Columbus and his 1492 partners Michael Barnathan and Mark Radcliffe produced "Nine Months" (which Columbus directed) and "Jingle All the Way." Upcoming films under the new agreement include "Shields Green and the Gospel of John Brown," about abolitionist John Brown and his relationship with a freed slave; "The Fantastic Four," based on the comic book series; the comedy-drama "My Ride With Gus"; and the fantasy-comedy "Once More With Feeling." Columbus recently helmed the Susan Sarandon/Julia Roberts starrer "Stepmom" for TriStar.

Miramax Films co-chairmen Bob and Harvey Weinstein will be honored with the Independent Feature Project's Gotham Award for Lifetime Achievement at a gala to be held Sept. 16 at the Hammerstein Ballroom in New York. The IFP Gotham Awards honor those who demonstrate an outstanding commitment to independent film; past recipients include Al Pacino, Robert Shaye, Arthur Krim, Irwin Young, Martin Scorsese and Sam Cohn. Held on the second night of the Independent Feature Film Market, the ceremony is expected to draw about 900 attendees. The Weinsteins were instrumental in bringing independent fare to the mainstream, most dramatically demonstrated by the critical acclaim and $100+ million domestic gross of 1994's "Pulp Fiction," which, as a "niche" film, in the past would not have received the marketing push or wide distribution crucial to its blockbuster success. Miramax's most recent triumph was its epic romance-drama "The English Patient," which swept the 1996 Oscars and has earned more than $76 million domestically to date.

Actor James Mason's son, Morgan Mason, who founded the William Morris Agency's independent films division, has been hired to head up London Films and revivify its production arm. London Films was founded by Alexander Korda in the 1930s, and its library includes such titles as "The Scarlet Pimpernel" and "The Ghost Goes West," but the company in recent years has not been involved in filmmaking, focusing instead on sales of its already-existing product. Now, under Mason's leadership, London plans to produce three to five films a year—both original projects and remakes of its own films.

Stephen Herek, who directed "101 Dalmatians" for Buena Vista under a three-picture deal, has renewed for another three pictures with the studio. "Dalmatians" (which has grossed more than $136 million domestically to date) was only the first film in the initial deal, so Herek's on board for at least five more movies. The next film he'll helm will be under the Disney/Touchstone division.

The L.A. Superior Court ordered 20th Century Fox to pay writer-director Ron Shelton ("Tin Cup") a sum of $9.8 million for compensation due, but never paid, under his former deal with the studio. Shelton's suit claimed that Fox failed to meet its contractual obligation to pay him half the net profits from "White Men Can't Jump." The studio can appeal the verdict, but would have to post a bond worth 150 percent of the award ($15 million) to start the process.

In Holland

Come to Cinema Expo in Amsterdam and see the World's Finest Stereo Processor.

The SMART PANASTEREO CSP1200 will not only out perform every cinema stereo processor on the market, but also out feature every other product in the premium class category. There is no compromise in design whether you are playing digital, SR, 70mm, or any other format including Video from Laser Disc. Even the expensive CP-500 or 5 year old CP-65 cannot match the numbers of the PANASTEREO. Approved for use in THX systems. Many customers report that they believed the CSP1200 was playing digital sound when it was playing analog soundtracks! It's that good! We will be pleased to tell you more. Please see us at Booth 192.

HOLLYWOOD REPORT

NICOLAS CAGE

"Detective" Find

WILL SMITH

"Wild" Man

LAUREN HOLLY

Something "New"

"WHAT DREAMS MAY COME" Robin Williams will headline this romantic drama about a man who dies but whose spirit remains earthbound, as he can't bear the thought of leaving his wife. His wife is then trapped in Hell, and Williams' character must team with a tracker ("Jerry Maguire's" Cuba Gooding Jr.) to save her. Vincent Ward ("Map of the Human Heart") will helm; Ron Bass ("The Joy Luck Club") scripts. (Distribution to be set)

"IT'S A DOG'S LIFE" Chris Farley ("Beverly Hills Ninja") will star in this fantasy/comedy about household pets magically transformed into human beings. As a pup-turned-person, Farley must win over the lady of the house before she is seduced by a transmogrified pet snake (possibly to be played by Alec Baldwin). (Warner Bros.)

"DEFECTIVE DETECTIVE" Terry Gilliam ("12 Monkeys") will direct Nicolas Cage ("Con Air") in this comedy/drama whose plot is in the vein of Gilliam's 1981 film "Time Bandits." Cage will play a detective who's searching for a lost girl in New York and ends up on a fantastic adventure. Gilliam co-scripts with Richard LaGravenese, his "The Fisher King" collaborator. (Universal)

"BELOVED" TV talk show host Oprah Winfrey ("The Color Purple") returns to the silver screen alongside Thandie Newton ("Gridlock'd") in this period drama about a slave haunted by the ghost of the baby daughter she'd killed years before. Jonathan Demme ("Philadelphia") is in talks to helm. This adaptation of Toni Morrison's novel will be produced through Winfrey's Harpo Prods. (Buena Vista)

"WILD, WILD WEST" This adaptation of the '60s TV series will reteam "Men In Black" star Will Smith and "MIB" director Barry Sonnenfeld. Smith will play James T. West (originally portrayed by Robert Conrad). Johnny Depp and George Clooney are possible contenders for the part of sidekick Artemus Gordon. (Warner Bros.)

"LONG TIME, NOTHING NEW" A small-town woman ("A Smile Like Yours'" Lauren Holly) must find the courage to forget her past and move forward with her life in this drama scripted and directed by Edward Burns ("She's the One"), who also co-stars. (Gramercy)

"SIMPLE SIMON" In this drama helmed by Harold Becker ("City Hall"), Bruce Willis will play an FBI agent on the run from the government. With him is an autistic boy who has inadvertently broken into secret databases. Alec Baldwin ("Ghosts of Mississippi"), who worked with Becker for 1993's "Malice," co-stars as their nemesis. (Universal)

"DOGMA" Kevin Smith ("Chasing Amy") next tells the story of a woman chosen by renegade angels to save humanity. Smith will play a role alongside "Chasing Amy" stars Ben Affleck and Joey Lauren Adams. Jason Scott Lee ("Jungle Book") is in talks to play the angel of death. (Miramax)

"IN TOO DEEP" In this black comedy, a man (not yet cast) learns his best friend ("Inventing the Abbotts'" Joaquin Phoenix) is sleeping with his wife ("An Awfully Big Adventure's" Georgina Cates). He then plots to fake his own death and frame the friend for murder. Vince Vaughn ("Swingers") and Janeane Garofalo ("Romy & Michele's High School Reunion") co-star. David Dobkin will direct. (Gramercy)

"KNOCK OFF" Jean-Claude Van Damme and director Tsui Hark, who joined for "Double Team," reteam in this terrorist actioner scripted by Steven de Souza ("Die Hard"). Lela Rochon ("Waiting to Exhale") will play a CIA operative who helps him in his plan to take down the terrorist conspiracy. (Distribution to be set)

"TARZAN AND JANE" The Edgar Rice Burroughs character leaves civilization to return to Africa to save his homeland. Casper Van Dien ("Starship Troopers") will play the famed jungle man, and Jane March ("Color of Night") will play Jane. (Distribution to be set)

"BODY COUNT" A "Jade" reteaming, Linda Fiorentino and David Caruso will star in this film about an art heist gone wrong. Co-starring are Ving Rhames ("Rosewood"), Forest Whitaker ("Species"), John Leguizamo ("The Pest") and Donnie Wahlberg ("Ransom"). Robert Spruill ("The Squeeze") will helm. (Distribution is to be set)

"BEGIN THE BEGUINE" Elijah Wood ("Flipper") and Anna Paquin ("Fly Away Home") will star in this coming-of-age love story scripted by Raymond De Felitta ("Cafe Society"). (Distribution to be set)

"KISS OR KILL" Down Under helmer Bill Bennett ("Two If By Sea") will direct "Love and Other Catastrophes'" Frances O'Connor and Matt Day in this dramatic thriller about a couple running from police across Australia's Nullarbor desert. When a series of murders occur along their route, each suspects the other. Bennett also scripts and produces. (Distribution to be set)

"THE RISE AND FALL OF LITTLE VOICE" This adaptation of the hit British play will star "Trainspotting's" Ewan McGregor and Jane Horrocks ("Life Is Sweet"). Horrocks also starred in the original play in Lancashire. Sam Mendes directs. (Distribution to be set)

"THE ROAD TO GRACELAND" Jonathon Schaech ("That Thing You Do!") will play a man whose life is shattered when his wife is killed in a car accident, but he's helped through this trying time by a man (Harvey Keitel) who he thinks is Elvis Presley. Bridget Fonda is in talks to play Marilyn Monroe. David Winkler, son of director/producer Irwin Winkler ("The Net"), will direct and script. (Distribution to be set)

"THE FAMILY BLOOM" In this drama, Penelope Ann Miller ("The Shadow") will play a woman who gives up her own life to take care of her widowed brother and his children. But that life to which she's become accustomed falls apart when the brother decides to remarry. Newcomer Craig Saavedra directs; Eric Tuchman ("Anastasia") scripts. (Distribution to be set)

ET CETERA: "Volcano's" Anne Heche has been cast opposite Harrison Ford in Buena Vista's romantic comedy "6 Days, 7 Nights"...Harry Connick Jr. will take his first romantic lead in Fox's "Hope Floats," which stars Sandra Bullock and is being helmed by Forest Whitaker ("Waiting to Exhale")...Gena Rowlands, Gillian Anderson and Harry Dean Stanton have joined Sharon Stone in Miramax's "Freak the Mighty" ...Chris Columbus ("Nine Months") will direct Julia Roberts and Susan Sarandon in TriStar's "Stepmom," about a dying woman who befriends her husband's new girlfriend... Lending their voices to Fox's Eddie Murphy starrer "Dr. Dolittle" are Ving Rhames as a tiger, Chris Rock as a guinea pig, John Leguizamo as a rat and Paul Reubens as a raccoon.

BEST BET: THE PATHE TUSCHINSKI THEATER

Going to Cinema Expo '97? Treat Yourself to an Afternoon at Amsterdam's Finest Movie Palace

by Ray Greene

INTERIOR DECO-RATING: This plush, luxuriant concessions area in Amsterdam's Tuschinski Theater demonstrates the unique design concepts Abram Tuschinski and his designers brought to life.

Amsterdam is an easy city to fall in love with. Like many modern European cities with a long history extending back to a pre-industrial era, it is comfortably configured for those who like a brisk walk, and that walk is made all the more satisfying by a gorgeous architectural landscape that makes almost every building, from the extraordinarily grand Royal Palace in Dam Square to the random pub or restaurant around any given corner, a feast for the eyes, and just as often a feast for the mind.

The "feast for the eyes" aspect of Amsterdam is easy to discern—every street corner has its own structural offering to make to the attentive visitor, and the famed canals which bind it all together are not only a marvelous way to get a quick, thumbnail tour of the whole local topography, they more than live up to their reputation for tranquil beauty and splendor. Unlike, for example, most American places of interest, Amsterdam has the virtue of being a place where almost nothing has been fabricated for the tourist's benefit. The canals, for all the tour boats plying their waters, are a real and thriving part of the economic and social life of the city. The many museums are a cultural shrine to Amsterdam's (and Europe's) rich artistic tradition—the Dutch are just good enough to share them with you, too. From the notorious "red light" district to the shopping areas to the local bars and restaurants, the "tourist" elements which greet a visitor are not separated from the way the natives lead their lives, and there's an extra thrill in knowing that, with every experience had in Amsterdam, one is shoulder to shoulder with average people, going about the business of their daily lives.

How Amsterdam also manages to be a "feast for the mind" is well demonstrated, especially for the theatre professional, by the splendor of what may be its grandest commercial building: the historic Tuschinski Theater, the Dutch flagship of the Pathe circuit and the largest cinema in all of Amsterdam. Currently celebrating its 76th year of operation, the Tuschinski is a living example of a uniquely European approach to the "movie palace" architecture that flourished in a brassier and more hyperbolic form across the Atlantic in the U.S.A. during the same period as the Tuschinski's construction. Where a definitive American palace of the '20s like Sid Grauman's Hollywood-based Chinese Theatre can be read as a reflection of America's fascination with the grandiose, the Tuschinski offers a more stately vision of luxuriousness.

Lush hardwood surfaces in a variety of woodfaces are perhaps the most defining architectural feature of this wonderful building—one of the few examples of architecture from Amsterdam's immediate post-WWI era to have survived with both exterior and interior intact. Where an exhibitor like Sid Grauman used his theatres to define Hollywood chutzpah and showmanship, it could be argued that Abram Tuschinski, the Polish exhibitor who built the Dutch theatre that bears his name, was in part a philosophical reflection of the democratization movement that swept through Europe after the downfall of the German Kaiser and Russia's Czar.

Tuschinski's quite noble stated aim in building the Tuschinski was to bring the luxury of the upper classes to within easy reach of the common man, and virtually every design feature of the theatre he left behind triumphantly proclaims the success of his venture. The Art Deco influence of which the wealthier classes were so enamored during the 1920s is prevalent—so much so that the Tuschinski is often cited as a prime example of that architectural school. Deco fans will love the clean, rounded lines of the Tuschinski's hundreds of light fixtures, the sheer marbleized surfaces of its concessions counter spaces and its imposing, slightly rococo stairwells and balustrades.

But though the Deco school is amply and gorgeously represented throughout the Tuschinski's grand design, Tuschinski and his architects took a more playful and eclectic approach to their task in creating the theatre. There is a Mighty Wurlitzer organ dating back to the '20s made and shipped to the house from the Wurlitzer plant in Tonawanda, U.S.A. which is used today mainly for concerts and which is considered such a priceless national treasure that it is actually protected by government statute. There's a touch of Sid Grauman's taste for the exotic in the theatre's many bas relief murals and its sculptures, most of which are Far Eastern in influence, some even resembling the work of the pre- and early-Christian Arab icon artists. Uniquely Dutch motifs are also present throughout the theatre, reflecting two discrete architectural movements: the "Jugendstil," which is an ancient building approach, and the more modern Amsterdam school, derived in part from some of the theories on functionalism of the Bauhaus group.

Aside from beautiful pine and mahogany flooring, virtually every covered inch of the Tuschinski is swathed in specially-created hand-woven Persian carpets, created according to a unique design scheme which enhances and unifies the Middle Eastern with the Art Deco components of the theatre's grand style. In many ways it's the floor coverings which serve to bridge the differing visual approaches manifested by the Tuschinski's architecture—the place where divergent influences meet, mingle and give birth to the new.

If there is any one feature of the Tuschinski which perhaps best embodies the democratic spirit of Abram Tuschinski's original ideal, it is the relationship of its two main balconies to the largest of the Tuschinski's six auditoriums. Here, where the attractions which would draw audience's to the house would be displayed, Tuschinski and his builders struggled to ensure that virtually every moviegoer's experience would be identical, and of the highest order.

Sightlines were the principal problem in designing the ultimate viewing place. What Tuschinski and his collaborators came up with was a stunning and unheard of design allowing for two enormous balconies spanning the entire rear section of the main auditorium to hang in the air without the use of even a single column for support. It's a breathtaking sight, and little short of miraculous given the building materials of the day; in their successful quest to ensure that every seat in the Tuschinski had a clear view of the screen, Tuschinski's team created an architectural miracle that seems to defy gravity. While the entire theatre is filled with inspired touches, the main auditorium is, appropriately enough, the culmination.

Amsterdam is a city of wonders, many of which—from the Van Gogh Museum to the Anne Frankhuis to the Rijksmuseum—are justly world-famous. The beauty of its cinematic wonders is by no means limited to the Tuschinski—there are many fine theatres in and about the city proper, a wide range of which are within easy walking distance of Dam Square. But for anyone who loves the architectural possibilities inherent in the moviehouse and who is looking for something special to do while at the Cinema Expo this year, you could do worse than to spend an afternoon at the Tuschinski. And while you're at it, take in a movie. After all, when it's all said and done, that's really what it's all about. ■

75-minute guided tours of the Tuschinski Theater are available during the months of July and August every Sunday and Monday morning at 10:30. Groups are welcome year round, but should apply in writing for a reservation at least one week in advance. For tour info (in Amsterdam): 020-623-1510. Fax: 020-625-3199.

DISNEY ANIMATION Gets Back on Track With "HERCULES," an Animated Epic for the Gods by Joseph McBride

While the relatively lukewarm public reception for Disney's last animated feature, "The Hunchback of Notre Dame," perhaps stemmed in part from the liberties it took with its classic Victor Hugo text, Disney is not backpedaling into reverence with its new animated film, "Hercules." The studio's brashly irreverent take on the classical Greek legend is satirical and anachronistic, replete with contemporary gags about pop culture and the commercialization of heroism. That hip comedic approach is the trademark of writer/director/producers John Musker and Ron Clements, whose previous Disney features have included "The Great Mouse Detective," "The Little Mermaid" and "Aladdin."

Following the triumphant release of "Aladdin" in 1992, Disney held brainstorming sessions to help Musker and Clements choose their next project. In recent years, with such animated films as "The Lion King," "Aladdin" and "Pocahontas," the studio has been expanding its cultural horizons beyond its traditional reliance on European fairy tales. Currently in the works are such animated features as "Tarzan"; "Mulan" (formerly "The Legend of Fa Mulan"), set in China; and "Children of the Sun," which takes place in Peru. Greek mythology seemed an exciting stylistic and narrative option for Disney's 35th full-length animated feature. "Aside from the 'Pastoral' sequence in 'Fantasia,' Disney has generally avoided dealing with classical mythology," Clements says. "But for an artist it's fun to do different things. Mythology seems a bigger canvas, dealing with bigger issues.

"We were considering 'The Odyssey.' It scared us a little bit—it seemed too sacred, not something we could have fun with. Hercules was the Capra hero of his time, the common-man hero, a meat-and-potatoes kind of hero."

Sharing a disdain for the starchy movie conventions of sword-and-sandal epics, the directors had no desire to treat Hercules as the stodgy, standard-issue superhero familiar from the 1959 Steve Reeves movie "Hercules" or the current live-action TV series "Hercules: The Legendary Journeys." They decided to "adopt a humorous tone" toward their title character because "anachronistic humor would give more of an entry into the film," Musker explains.

Not only would a more modern approach to Hercules appeal to animation's youthful target audience, but it was also a natural fit for the two filmmakers, whose work always has been replete with jocular references to other movies and pop-cultural artifacts. "We're trying to make movies for ourselves first and foremost," Musker admits. "We're our own audience."

Purists might object to the film's downplaying or jettisoning of some of the elements of classical mythology, including such venerable standbys as the Twelve Labors of Hercules. And, in line with Disney's always-conservative approach to touchy sexual issues, Hercules is no longer the illegitimate son of a god (Zeus) and a human mother (Hera). Hera has been elevated to goddess status in the movie, and Hercules's half-human nature now results from a magical potion imperfectly administered by minions of the villainous Hades, Lord of the Underworld.

But Musker and Clements (along with co-writers Bob Shaw, Don McEnery and Irene Mecchi) have used those narrative metamorphoses as the springboard for much of the film's drama and adventure, with the youthful Hercules growing up conflicted about his identity and determined to prove himself a "true hero" in the eyes of both his fellow Greeks and his Olympian father. Tate Donovan ("Equinox") does the voice of the young-adult Hercules; Joshua Keaton and Roger Bart provide the character's adolescent speaking and singing voices.

> "In becoming sort of the Michael Jordan of his day, Hercules learns there is more to being a hero than being an action hero."
> —John Musker

Describing Hercules as "Jimmy Stewart in the body of Arnold Schwarzenegger," Clements says the film has a strong Frank Capra influence throughout, both in plot and characterizations. On a bulletin board in the filmmakers' production office, the storylines of such Capra classics as "Mr. Deeds Goes to Town," "Mr. Smith Goes to Washington" and "Meet John Doe" are prominently displayed on index cards as aide-mémoire.

Like the naive young senator so memorably played by Stewart in "Mr. Smith Goes to Washington," Disney's "Hercules" is an idealistic country boy who ventures into the big city (in this case Thebes, aka "The Big Olive") and finds himself surrounded by voracious, worldly-wise cynics. Eventually, as in a Capra movie, idealism narrowly triumphs over the forces of darkness. "All the former cynics," Musker says, "become rallying people" to help Hercules prove his heroism. Among them is the gnomish satyr Philoctetes (voiced by Danny DeVito), an athletic trainer whose personality the directors describe as part William Demarest, part Burgess Meredith via "Rocky."

The film's heroine, Megara, is modeled after the characters played by Jean Arthur and Barbara Stanwyck in the Capra classics. A cynical, fast-talking city dame who's been kicked around, Meg serves as Hades' moll until she rediscovers her romantic idealism under the purifying influence of the good-hearted hero she has set out to exploit and betray. This brassy, experienced heroine breaks the wholesome mold of Disney's animated leading ladies, even though she has the voice of Susan Egan, a Tony nominee on Broadway for playing Belle in the stage version of Disney's "Beauty and the Beast."

STRENGTH

TO STRENGTH

Composer Alan Menken, the eight-time Oscar winner whose Disney credits have included "Beauty and the Beast," "The Hunchback of Notre Dame," "The Little Mermaid" and "Aladdin," says Egan brought a "wonderful wry quality" to the role of Meg. "She's tough and yet vulnerable." Menken's collaborator on "Hercules" was lyricist David Zippel, a Tony winner for "City of Angels" and a newcomer to Disney animation.

Working with Musker and Clements is "a riot," Menken says, "because each song becomes a standout song. You have less of the kinds of songs that are built in and forwarding plot in a complicated way. The songs they like me to write and that make them really fun are production numbers, comedy numbers, and heavily stylized numbers. 'Hercules' is just so funny, so fast-paced, so entertaining."

One of the most daring aspects of "Hercules" is its incorporation of African-American musical idioms to convey hope, idealism and soulfulness, a suggestion by the directors that Menken and Zippel eagerly embraced. The five Muses making up the film's Greek chorus—Calliope, Thalia, Clio, Melpomene and Terpsichore, sung by Lillias White, Vaneese Thomas, Cheryl Freeman, LaChanze and Roz Ryan—vocalize in a style Menken describes as "sort of New Orleans funk," a blend of gospel with rhythm and blues.

That element was added to give the film "a stylistic twist that you wouldn't normally expect," says lyricist Zippel. "Because everything in this show has a twist. Nothing is quite straight on, except for the emotions."

Danny DeVito's big musical number, "One Last Hope," is played as a flamboyant pastiche of vaudeville and Broadway show tunes. Menken urged him to "think Jimmy Durante." But, recalls the composer, DeVito "didn't do Jimmy Durante. It sounded like Danny DeVito singing, and it really worked."

Another example of the film's incessant stream of showbiz in-jokery is James Woods' motor-mouthed portrayal of Hades as what Clements calls "the hippest villain we've ever had, a Hollywood-agent type of personality. When [former agent] Michael Ovitz was here [as president of the Walt Disney Co. until his departure last December], we couldn't say that. Now we can."

"HERC" JERK: Hades is a blue-haired fast talker with teeth as sharp as a talent agent.

Hercules" also pokes sly, self-referential fun at Disney merchandising tie-ins by showcasing "Hercules Stores" peddling hero-worshipping souvenir products, including such items as vases featuring Herc's valiant visage. There's a certain eternal verity to such gags, the filmmakers believe, because the Greek gods filled a function in their society much like that now performed by movie stars or the British royal family in today's media-saturated culture.

By offering this "gentle parody" of the machinery by which heroes are created, Musker and Clements have a low-key moral message in mind for the young among their family audiences. "In becoming sort of the Michael Jordan of his day, Hercules learns there is more to being a hero than being an action hero," Musker says. "Understanding the difference between celebrityhood and genuine heroism is good for kids today."

The movie's bustling city of Thebes, beset by myriad natural disasters, is meant to evoke contemporary New York or Los Angeles—a place in which, as Clements puts it, "they need a hero but they don't believe in heroes. Hercules finally attains heroism when he's not trying to. That's when he learns a self-sacrificing attitude. He finds that heroism has to come from the heart."

Just as the stylized look of "Aladdin" was influenced by Persian art, the ancient Greek setting of "Hercules" inspired its own offbeat style of animation, evoking the art of Attic pottery. "'Hercules' has a two-dimensional quality, more stylized, less representational, and more

Why You Should Install Dolby Digital.

Why digital sound?

Digital sound is more realistic, more dynamic, more spectacular—and a powerful audience attraction. Without it, any exhibitor today is at a big disadvantage.

Why Dolby Digital?

There are far more Dolby Digital titles (900 released and announced) than any other digital format—and every print has a digital soundtrack. If you book a Dolby Digital title, you get a print with a Dolby Digital soundtrack—no exceptions, no excuses. And when it comes to film sound, no name is more familiar to audiences than "Dolby."

Isn't it expensive?

Dolby Digital is remarkably affordable today. The price of processors has come down significantly, and projector manufacturers now offer cost-effective soundheads integrating both digital and analog readers.

What support does Dolby provide?

Only Dolby offers a choice of exciting digital trailers, plus marketing aids from window signs to lobby posters. What's more, as improvements to the Dolby Digital process are developed, they are included right on Dolby Digital prints as software that automatically loads into your theatre's processor to update it.

How can I find out about upcoming Dolby Digital titles?

A regularly updated list of Dolby Digital films, both released and announced, is posted at www.dolby.com, the Dolby web site. You can also contact Dolby Laboratories directly for the list.

decorative" than the traditional Disney animated film, Musker notes. "But at the same time we're still trying to work in three dimensions, with the Disney illusion of moving in deep space."

So that the creative team could absorb authentic location atmosphere, Musker and Clements took key department heads on a trip to Greece and Turkey in summer 1994. Shooting video footage and still photographs for reference, they discovered unexpected details they later incorporated into the film's visual texture. "All the sites were overrun with goats," Musker recalls with amusement. "Throughout the film we sprinkled a more liberal dose of goats. That helped give it a life, a certain color."

The noted British artist and political cartoonist Gerald Scarfe, whose distinctive style relies on bold caricature and finely filigreed calligraphy, also came on board the "Hercules" production, aiding with character designs. Scarfe, whose conceptual drawings flowed from England to Burbank for three years, "was basically our graphic designer," Clements says, although Andy Gaskill served as art director.

On "Aladdin," the filmmakers employed artist Al Hirschfeld in a similar capacity to Scarfe's on "Hercules." In both films, animation buffs also can detect the uncredited influence of the boldly stylized UPA cartoons that challenged Disney's hegemony in the 1950s. "Hercules" makes intermittent use of CGI techniques as well, for sequences involving morphing clouds and a thirty-headed monster, the Hydra.

ting-edge animation directors. Not only are they "well-known around Disney for being adventurous when it comes to technology," says their fellow "Hercules" producer Alice Dewey, "they are unique because they are writer/directors, so they have a very careful sense of what their movie is and have thought it through from the genesis.

MOM & POP OUTFIT: Hera specializes in ambrosia batches, Zeus in lightning bolts.

EARLY WORK: Musker and Clements' "The Little Mermaid" swims back into theatres this Thanksgiving.

The unusual blend of influences on Musker and Clements, and their willingness to experiment with diverse styles of animation, helps account for their status as Disney's most cut-

"Because this is their fourth picture," Dewey continues, "they have a tremendous amount of experience, not only with animation but with each other."

With animation profits soaring over the past few years, the competition among Hollywood studios for animation artists and directors has become increasingly feverish. Keeping Musker and Clements on the lot has been a high priority for Disney. When animation honcho Jeffrey Katzenberg left as chairman of Walt Disney Studios in 1994 and became a partner with Steven Spielberg and David Geffen in DreamWorks SKG, Musker wrote a memo to his Disney colleagues declaring, "Well, guys, I think everybody's salary just went up."

Musker and Clements held talks with DreamWorks and Warner Bros., but last year they decided to sign exclusive new agreements with Disney. "There were long-term projects we wanted to do, and there are good people here," Musker explains. The newly competitive atmosphere is "good for artists, because it's not so monolithic. It helped us when we did 'The Little Mermaid' that Spielberg [and Don Bluth] had done 'An American Tail.' We talked to Jeff and said, 'We've got to do the storm at sea better. We've got to top them.'"

The next project for Musker and Clements is another stylistic challenge, an animated sci-fi feature titled "Treasure Planet." A futuristic version of "Treasure Island," populated with robots and cyborgs, it is being planned for release in either the year 2000 or 2001. "It has to be at least one of those dates," Clements explains, "because those are good graphic numbers."

"Hercules." Voices by Tate Donovan, James Woods, Rip Torn and Danny DeVito. Directed by John Musker and Ron Clements. Written by Ron Clements & John Musker, Bob Shaw & Don McEnery and Irene Mecchi. Produced by Alice Dewey, John Musker and Ron Clements. A Buena Vista release. Animated. Opens wide June 27.

UNLIMITED ANIMATION

Remembering the Golden Era of UPA, the Little Animation Studio that Could by Ray Greene

A funny thing happened on the way to our nostalgic Big Picture feature this month. As a magazine fortunate enough to call Oscar-winning animator Ernest Pintoff a friend, we came up with an idea we thought might complement our cover story, then told Ernie what we had in mind. Original art seemed not only possible but called for, and Ernie said he thought he had something on hand that might help us out.

What he came up with was something so special we felt a black-and-white page couldn't do it justice. In the meantime, the subject selected for consideration proved vast enough to require more than our usual page space.

The solution was easy: move the Big Picture forward into a full four-color double spread that would meet the visual and narrative possibilities facilitated by the art Ernie managed to supply. Continuity fans will find the Big Picture back where it belongs next month. In the meantime, we hope you'll enjoy this rare format departure for the little summertime gift it is meant to provide.

CAUSE... Gerald McBoing Boing, titular star of the 1951 UPA short that grabbed an Oscar and marked an early example of the studio's graphic style.

Caricature has always been a part of the animator's art. From the earliest Mickey Mouse cartoons to Felix the Cat to Betty Boop and Ub Iwerks' Flip the Frog, the pioneers of film animation took a wicked delight in presenting exaggerated and at times grotesque images of the popular figures of their day. But "formal" caricature—the kind reserved for illustrations in the slick magazines of the '40s and '50s, and which survives in part in the recent feature film work of "Aladdin" and "Hercules" co-directors John Musker and Ron Clements—really only found its way into theatrical animation in the early 1950s, thanks to a then-Columbia based animation studio called United Productions of America, aka UPA.

There was a reason why it took so long for what should have seemed a natural marriage to take place: the unprecedented success and influence of the Walt Disney Studios during the '30s and '40s. Though the stories were fanciful, the visual aesthetic behind such signature works as "Snow White," "Pinocchio" and even "Fantasia" was grounded in the concept of ever more convincing dimensionality and realism. Under the guidance of founders Walt and Roy Disney, the Disney Studios became famous for the rigorous discipline they subjected their artists to, which embraced art classes and movement studies with one goal in mind: to replace the amorphous and inconsistent motion which virtually all early cartoons suffered from with something approaching the real thing.

Disney's success at re-inventing the way animation looked is apparent not only in its own work from the period but in that of all its significant competitors of the early sound era. Original Mickey Mouse animator Iwerks foundered when he started his own studio, in large part because of misguided attempts to match the production value of the Disney short subjects division which he himself had helped create. At Paramount, Max and Dave Fleischer, who were arguably Disney's closest and most imaginative rivals throughout the '30s, were forced by the studio into feature animation production in the aftermath of "Snow White's" stunning boxoffice achievement, overextending and eventually bankrupting themselves in the process. At MGM, the Tom and Jerry series put the slapstick energy of "Steamboat Willie" together with a lush pictorial style to create one of animation's longest running success stories, while at Warner Bros., awareness of the Disney house style contributed in the margins to the evolution of an increasingly three-dimensional approach to the medium.

UPA was the one cartoon studio that was founded upon a specific mandate to reject the influential Disney house style in favor of a more eclectic approach, embracing fine artists as disparate as Lautrec and Daumier as well as contemporary mannerists from Thurber to Hirschfeld. The brainchild of a generation of Disney animators who had been hired out of the art schools as opposed to being brought up within Disney itself, UPA was born out of an eclectic group of artists' desire to expand the graphic boundaries of animation into realms that had been largely off-limits at Disney, but which were the bread and butter of modern art.

A bitter labor strike at Disney in 1941 pitted the younger, more socially-conscious generation against the more established Disney loyalists, and many of the new breed went to work for director Frank Tashlin at the upstart animation studio Screen Gems. From there, members of this breakaway unit formed their own company, run originally by Steve Bosustow, Zack Schwartz and Dave Hilberman, with a stellar animation team including at various times the likes of John Hubley, Bobe Cannon, Bill Hurtz, Bill Melendez and Ernest Pintoff—all legends within the animation field, and each of whom continued to work out ideas first expressed at UPA in subsequent work of groundbreaking achievement.

Though most famous for its enduring "serial" character, Mr. Magoo, UPA's output was as varied as the visual sources it drew upon. "Gerald McBoing Boing" (1951) was only the eleventh UPA cartoon produced and is widely believed to be the first full articulation of the UPA house style. In an irony that probably wasn't lost on Walt Disney, it grabbed the Academy Award for Best Animated Short Subject, which created the unlikely Oscar spectacle of UPA's Bosustow standing shoulder to shoulder with Walt Disney himself, who was accepting an Oscar for "Beaver Valley," 1951's best live action short.

"Madeline," the popular French children's book series, made it to the screen in a Bobe Cannon-directed short from 1952 that flawlessly replicated Ludwig Bemelman's singular graphic style, while Bill Hurtz helped bring the unique vision of New Yorker cartoonist James Thurber to life in his 1953 adaptation of Thurber's "A Unicorn in the Garden." The James Mason-narrated rendering of Poe's "Tell-Tale Heart" (directed by Ted Parmelee in 1953) was a UPA highpoint—an eerie and sumptuous seven-minute nightmare rendered in a surreal, first-person style derived equally from Dali, expressionist theatre and UPA's own evocative house style.

By 1953, the somewhat pejorative term "limited animation" had been applied to the UPA technique (some insiders blame Disney for the term) owing to UPA's interest in stylization. To aficionados, the term is a misnomer; in its audacious and restive desire to re-invent animation with each new cartoon, UPA's output of theatrical cartoons was as boundlessly adventurous—as *un*limited, if you will—as any body of cinematic work ever created.

AND EFFECT: Oscar-winning animator Ernest Pintoff got his start at UPA. His later, highly personal works reflect the UPA influence. ABOVE: Study based on Pintoff's "Flebus," made at Terrytoons. TOP: Study based on Pintoff's self-produced "The Violinist."

Such a group of free spirits was bound to waft apart over time. There were management difficulties which resulted in Bosustow taking full control of the studio; over the course of the 1950s, key creative talent drifted, often into the then-nascent field of TV work (where UPA itself was a pioneer). The TV medium was uniquely configured to take advantage of UPA's ability to make arresting visual material out of fixed resources; as a result, the UPA approach defined a whole generation of TV's animation style, even when UPA itself wasn't directly involved.

But TV soon ended the era of the theatrical cartoon short, and UPA's two attempts at feature length animation (the Magoo-starring "1001 Arabian Nights" and "Gay Pur-ee," based on a story co-authored by Chuck Jones) were boxoffice flops. Core UPA personnel continued to flourish elsewhere; such veterans as Parmelee and Hurtz helped create Jay Ward's popular "Rocky and Bullwinkle" cartoons, while Bill Melendez went on to become the producer behind such seasonal TV favorites as "A Charlie Brown Christmas" and "It's the Great Pumpkin, Charlie Brown"—part of a series of "Peanuts"-derived cartoons which, in their flawless emulation of the Charles Schulz originals, were pure UPA. Ernie Pintoff followed perhaps the most exceptional trajectory of all, going against the pattern for animators in the '50s and '60s by getting his first break as an animator in UPA's TV division and then moving into theatrical cartoons, where his Mel Brooks-narrated "The Critic" eventually won him an Oscar as producer/director of the best animated short of 1963.

Though UPA survives as a company, its days in the artistic vanguard are a distant memory today, and the company's achievement is all but forgotten except among professional animators and animation devotees. UPA's influence, however, is as available as the latest "Ren and Stimpy" or "Dr. Katz" cablecast, and can even be said to be reflected in part in Musker and Clements' recent Disney efforts. It's startling to look back and see just how far one small studio managed to expand the visual possibilities of the American cartoon. In this era, when more and more money is being invested by a variety of studios in animated features designed to look as much as possible as if they were made by Disney in its "golden era" prime, the UPA paradigm may be not just worth celebrating, but worth revisiting, as a model for the unlimited possibilities of color and line.

ON HER "HORIZON"

Kathleen Quinlan heads into action with Paramount's "Event Horizon"

by Bridget Byrne

Kathleen Quinlan (center) with co-stars Jason Isaacs and Joely Richardson in a scene from Paramount's August release, "Event Horizon."

"I took this because there are not many roles where women are really active," says actress Kathleen Quinlan, explaining why she'll be seen charging about in a spacesuit in "Event Horizon," an outer-space adventure that Paramount opens this August.

Recently, Quinlan has been in two films in which the do-or-die stuff was left to a man. Earlier this summer, she was the wife who went missing in "Breakdown," a highway horror movie headlined by Kurt Russell. And she was Oscar nominated as best supporting actress for her turn as Marilyn Lovell, the wife who had to keep her feet on the ground, literally as well as figuratively, when her astronaut husband Jim, played by Tom Hanks, soared off into destiny in the drama "Apollo 13."

Chuckling, Quinlan acknowledges that the choice to portray a medical technician on a space exploration team could well have been a subconscious reaction to her previous groundings. And, furthermore, she never set out in life to be a sit-it-out. Quinlan, now turned 40, excelled at gymnastics and diving as a teen. But in those days, before the influx of endorsement dollars for top athletes, she couldn't "figure out how you made a living doing that."

There was a gym for the actors at the Pinewood Studios in England, where "Event Horizon" was filmed. "We used it not because of wanting to look good, but because of the need to be in good shape to wear the heavy spacesuits. They are spectacular to look at but very hot. Putting one on was like going from chilly London winter weather to the Bahamas in just minutes," Quinlan says.

A search-and-rescue-mission movie, which also stars Laurence Fishburne, Sam Neill and Joely Richardson, "Event Horizon" is set in the confines of a huge and ghostly spacecraft that has mysteriously reappeared after being lost for years. Quinlan plays Peters, a single mother with a child back on earth; she's one of the space team struggling to cope in a ghastly atmosphere haunted by many things, including, says director Paul Anderson ("Mortal Kombat"), "the demons they bring with them."

Quinlan says that Anderson took the time to provide rehearsal interaction and clear storyboarded images of how the finished scenes would look—essential aids for the cast, who often found themselves emoting in a lonely void that would later be linked to special effects or the work of other actors. "A lot of time I was acting to nobody," says Quinlan, who rarely worked on the same days as did Fishburne, even though most of her scenes are actually with him.

Although Quinlan admits to never having had a deep-rooted interest in space, she feels that working on this sci-fi film and the reality-based "Apollo 13" has given her "more of a universal perspective." She says, "It's just too egotistical to think that we are the only lifeform in the universe," though the actress doesn't buy into any of the perceived images of aliens, which she believes are born out of the sort of fear and prejudice usually directed by humans toward anything unknown.

Quinlan, who grew up in Mill Valley, Calif., came to professional acting by chance when she was picked out of a "cattle call" at her high school. Billed as Kathy Quinlan, she was given the role of Peg, who appears at the sockhop in George Lucas' 1973 nostalgia piece, "American Graffiti." In 1977, her performance as a teenager being treated for schizophrenia in "I Never Promised You a Rose Garden" seemed to mark her out for major stardom. But since then Quinlan has favored lower-key films dominated by character work, such as 1983's "Independence Day" and 1988's "Clara's Heart."

> "Putting [on the spacesuit] was like going from chilly London winter weather to the Bahamas."

In conversation, Quinlan comes across as someone who thinks through her answers to questions; she's not glib or polished, just straightforward. On this day, she's back home in Malibu with her actor husband, Bruce Abbott, and their six-year-old son, Tyler, after a New York trip to promote "Breakdown." That film, she says, had even an industry audience "yelling and carrying on, perhaps because it taps into some unconscious fear we can all identify with."

Quinlan says she's happy now with her career, but she admits there were times when she questioned her choice. "When not much is happening and there seems to be nothing you can do to change that, you do wonder. But it just kept coming up that 'I am an actor, like it or not.' I stuck with it and took what was offered." Those offerings have also included "Hanky Panky," "Twilight Zone—The Movie" and "The Doors."

She says she is still a little surprised that she got the role in "Apollo 13," which reminded everyone of her talents. The film's director was, of course, Ron Howard, also an "American Graffiti" alumnus, which undoubtedly helped. But she feels that "some of the newer folks in the industry" too often cast for personality rather than character. "I'm not really sure they are familiar with the term 'acting.' They don't understand what it means to play a character rather than just be a personality," Quinlan muses.

Whatever the future holds, she says, "my dream job has already happened." Earlier this year, she starred in the MGM release "Zeus and Roxanne," a family comedy about a dog and dolphin that would be suitable for her son to see. During filming, she got to swim, and swim, and swim, in the open ocean with the dolphins. It was her idea of bliss because, this one-time diver and gymnast avers, "I am really a sea creature. Just a mammal that lost its fins."

"Event Horizon." Starring Laurence Fishburne, Kathleen Quinlan, Sam Neill and Joely Richardson. Directed by Paul Anderson. Written by Philip Eisner. Produced by Lawrence Gordon, Lloyd Levin and Jeremy Bolt. A Paramount release. Sci-fi. Opens August 1.

LENSING "MAGOO"

Hong Kong director Stanley Tong goes Disney with "Mr. Magoo"

by Wade Major

For his Hollywood debut, director Stanley Tong (above) is transforming cartoon character Mr. Magoo (right) to live-action.

Live-action adaptations of famous cartoons are hot. Hong Kong directors are hot. But only in Hollywood would anyone have dared think of pairing the two. Oddly enough, in the case of Disney's "Mr. Magoo," forthcoming this fall, the strange pairing seems inspired.

"They want me to make it more international," says director Stanley Tong, "because the original cartoon is so American. A lot of the verbal jokes don't translate. When you go to Europe and Asia and put on subtitles, you don't get the joke. What Disney liked about my work in 'First Strike' and 'Rumble in the Bronx' was that so much of the humor was visual."

Best known for his three epics with Jackie Chan—"Supercop," "Rumble in the Bronx" and "First Strike"—Tong is the latest Hong Kong action super-director to make the jump to America, right on the heels of John Woo, Ringo Lam and Tsui Hark. Unlike those of his cohorts, however, Tong's Hollywood debut will not feature action star Jean-Claude Van Damme. What's more, it won't even be an action film. It's a family comedy, which suits him fine.

"I don't really like my movies to be violent," he says. "Too much gunplay or too many explosions would kill the female audience, and parents might not want their children to see it. The reason I put so much comedy in my films is because I want to dilute the action element, not make it so much a 'hot' action picture. I'll have 'hot' action in it, but I try to interpret it in a comic way so all audiences will enjoy it and so they won't see it as a straight action picture."

Originally characterized by Jim Backus in a series of theatrical animated shorts beginning in 1949 and again on TV during the 1960s and '70s, the myopic Magoo has a predilection for unwittingly slipping in and out of hair-raising situations—a scenario that would seem tailor-made for Tong's unique blending of comic slapstick and complex action choreography.

That Tong has always handled the bulk of the action directing and stunt coordination himself (most Hong Kong directors hire dedicated action directors to handle complicated sequences) makes his accomplishments that much more impressive. Tong's work on "First Strike," in fact, earned him a 1996 Taiwanese Golden Horse award for best action direction. Tong, though, sees his diverse involvements as simply a logical extension of the work he began while still a stuntman.

"Jackie and I come from similar backgrounds," he says. "I started as a stuntman too, and after three years and hundreds of stunts I had broken my shoulder, my ribs and my knees and even gotten a gunshot wound on my right arm. I felt that, if I went on doing stunts, I'd soon kill myself. So I started working as an assistant director so I could learn more about production and the process of making a movie."

Like Chan, Tong quickly worked his way through the ranks, holding a variety of jobs—camera operator, stunt coordinator, production manager—before segueing into directing with his acclaimed 1989 debut film "Stone Age Warriors."

"When you see my films, I'm more Americanized than other Hong Kong directors," Tong says. "I do storyboards and preproduction very carefully. That system has been here for so many years, there must be a reason.

"In Hong Kong, it's true that I can do whatever I want to do—I can shoot for another day and not have to ask anyone. If I want to change a line in the script, I can do it on-set. In a way, that system is practical, but it also results in directors waiting until the last minute to do things. And that's not a good habit for a director."

> "What Disney liked about my work in 'First Strike' and 'Rumble in the Bronx' was that so much of the humor was visual."

For "Mr. Magoo," Disney has provided Tong with the best of both worlds: Hollywood professionalism and a level of creative freedom that's all but unheard of for a Hong Kong director. "They've even allowed me to bring in my crew," he says, "which is the first time that's happened to a Hong Kong director. Even John Woo can't bring over his assistant director and stunt coordinator. But I'm bringing over my assistant director, my director of photography, my stunt team. It's a package."

The one element missing from Tong's package, ironically, is the one that has proven most crucial to his success: Jackie Chan. But, with Leslie Nielsen starring as the mis-ocular Magoo, and a solid supporting cast that includes Kelly Lynch, Tong appears ready for a substantial Hollywood bow.

"I'm just working on designing the signature action set pieces," Tong says. The story: Evildoers are after an oblivious-as-always Quincy Magoo, a nearsighted millionaire into whose possession a stolen gem has fallen. "The challenge is to put in the signature action sequences while keeping them funny and humorous in a way that's true to the original."

Though he admits to feeling at home in the studio system, Tong stops short of committing himself to Hollywood for the long haul, as he's looking forward to yet another collaboration with Chan, this to be shot in India. "Whether I stay in America or in Hong Kong, I want to make international movies," he says.

"If there is a good story in Hong Kong with a Hong Kong actor, I would love to do it. But I have to take risks. If I don't take risks, then I do only things that I'm comfortable shooting. I believe that in order to have success as a director you have to have the guts to try something new, and you have to have the patience to make it happen."

"Mr. Magoo." Starring Leslie Nielsen, Kelly Lynch, Matt Keeslar, Nick Chinlund, Ernie Hudson and Malcolm McDowell. Directed by Stanley Tong. Written by Pat Proft, Tom Sherohman and Jeff Berry. Produced by Ben Myron. A Buena Vista release. Live-action comedy. Opens this fall.

Beltrac® Public Guidance Systems... Versatile, Beautiful, Adaptable.

As the premier world supplier of outstanding quality and innovative public guidance and hospitality products since 1979, we get around. In stores, theaters, banks, hotels, airports . . . just about any place where efficient guidance and direction of the public is important, you'll find people looking down on our Lavi Beltrac logo. After all, there are some pretty good reasons why Lavi is the leader in public guidance.

Versatile – Beltrac's integrated design conceals the retractable belt within the post. So there are no easily damaged parts or receptacles. Its patented 4-way post assures that one post will work for every possible configuration without costly add-ons.

Beautiful – Four metallic finishes, and a variety of Lido-Tone powder-coated post colors, combined with 15 belt colors give the designer a broad palette for any project. The 6'-6" belts provide highly visible space for printed messages or company identification and integrated sign frames complete your messaging options.

Adaptable – Beltrac portable posts offer an answer to the ever changing needs of public guidance, with wall-to-wall and post-to-post configurations. Of course, when your interior requirements call for solid brass or chrome posts with velour ropes, our Traditional line is second to none.

All systems are designed, engineered and manufactured in the United States.

AUGUST TRAILERS

Will there be hot August nights at the multiplex turnstiles?

For a month in which exhibitors usually suffer the Awful August Blues trying to sell tickets to the dogs of summer, this year's eighth frame holds augurs of promise. There's no new "Men In Black"-type dreadnought coming a-calling (unless the TBA "Titanic" sets sail), but the month opens more strongly than it did in 1996 and 1995, when exhibitors eagerly dialed up (unfortunately, it proved) "Chain Reaction" and "Virtuosity."

That's partly because August 1997 is front-loaded by distributors trying to eke out as much summer playing time for their titles as they can. Fortunately, although four major films bow 8/1, most lack direct competition. Paramount's "Event Horizon" will play to the male demo, Universal's "Leave It to Beaver" to families and Fox's "Picture Perfect" to the distaff draw. The real clash, for serious-minded moviegoers, is between Miramax's "CopLand" and Warner's "187." The 8/8 weekend is a bit more dicey, with Warner's "Free Willy 3" going against Disney's "Air Bud," and TriStar's "Desperate Measures" trying to outbreed New Line's "Spawn."

Event Horizon

In 2046, a prototype spaceship named the Event Horizon missing for seven years is found by a rescue team traveling the solar system. Led by Laurence Fishburne (also in "Hoodlum"), they discover that terrifying secrets lie within. This sci-fi thriller also stars Sam Neill ("Jurassic Park"), Kathleen Quinlan ("Breakdown") and Joely Richardson ("101 Dalmatians"). Paul Anderson ("Mortal Kombat") directs; Philip Eisner scripts; Lawrence Gordon ("Die Hard"), Lloyd Levin ("The Rocketeer") and Jeremy Bolt produce. See our Sneak Preview in this issue. (Paramount, 8/1)

Exploitips: Unless the likes of "Lost World" and "Men In Black" have sated the teen and twentysomething males, expect a hot August night at this boxoffice. For that demo, which supported Anderson's previous, the "Mortal Kombat" credit will be an attractant, as will the genre.

Leave It to Beaver

The Cleavers are back and living in the '90s. Based on the classic TV series, this family comedy features the same wholesome characters: wise father Ward ("Happy Gilmore's" Christopher McDonald), wholesome mom June ("Cliffhanger's" Janine Turner), big brother Wally (Erik Von Detten) and, of course, the Beaver (newcomer Cameron Finley). Andy Cadiff (TV's "Home Improvement") directs; Brian Levant ("Jingle All the Way") and Lon Diamond script; Levant produces with Robert Simonds (also "Happy Gilmore"). (Universal, 8/1)

Exploitips: Universal has had success and failure with TV reprises; think "The Flintstones" and "McHale's Navy." The plus here is that this is its date's only family flick. Play up the nostalgia factor to pull the thirty- and fortysomething parents who would make the moviegoing choice here for their brood.

Picture Perfect

Jennifer Aniston ("She's the One") stars in this romantic comedy about a woman who uses a random photo to invent a fictional boyfriend to help boost her career. Complications ensue when she actually meets the man in the photo and falls in love. Kevin Bacon, comic Jay Mohr and Illeana Douglas ("Wedding Bell Blues") co-star. Glenn Gordon Caron ("Love Affair") directs, and Caron scripts with Arlene Sorkin, Paul Slansky and Jeffrey Abrams; Erwin Stoff and Molly Madden produce. (Fox, 8/1)

Exploitips: Audiences will likely hope this is bouncier than Caron's turgid "Love Affair," but "Picture Perfect"—given the presence of Aniston, a TV superstar via "Friends"—will pull much younger. Despite the title-heavy weekend, this is 8/1's big romance, so the distaff and date-night demos are the likely targets.

187

Director Kevin Reynolds ("Waterworld") goes intimate with this dramatic thriller about a deeply committed high-school teacher ("A Time to Kill's" Samuel L. Jackson) who returns to the classroom a changed man after a long recuperation from a student attack. John Heard ("My Fellow Americans") and Kelly Rowan ("Candyman: Farewell to the Flesh") co-star. Former teacher Scott Yagemann scripts; "Braveheart's" Bruce Davey and Steve McEveety produce for Mel Gibson's Icon. (Warner, 7/30 wide)

Exploitips: Opening on a Wednesday, "187" has a two-day lead on its weekend's competition—and it might need that edge. The 8/1 slot is filled to overflowing, with key competition being "CopLand," also a drama, and "Event Horizon," which also will pull male. Warner's decision to go wide right away makes it a make-or-break debut.

Paperback Romance

A shy writer of erotica ("Two If By Sea's" Gia Carides) who's crippled breaks her leg. Provided the perfect "disguise," she goes after her dream man—a handsome but engaged jeweler ("Trees Lounge's" Anthony LaPaglia). Rom/com catastrophe follows. Formerly known as "Lucky Break." Ben Lewin ("The Favor, the Watch and the Very Big Fish") directs and scripts; Bob Weis ("Heartbreakers") produces. (Goldwyn, 8/1 ltd)

Exploitips: The name change works, as the demo here (women) read paperback romances. Try a catchline like "She wrote tales of love and lust—and then began to live one herself." Our critic (see our May 1997 issue) gave this 2 1/2 stars, calling it a "modestly charismatic" film. Expect the older female demo to opt for this over competitor "Picture Perfect."

Hamsun

Based on a book by Thorkild Hansen, this Norwegian drama follows the last 17 years of the life of Nobel-winning Norwegian writer Knut Hamsun (Max Von Sydow), whose questionable sup-

COPLAND

Sylvester Stallone stars in this drama about a hearing-impaired sheriff who keeps the peace in a small New Jersey burg where many New York police officers live. When a criminal investigation points toward his own town, the sheriff must decide whether to protect the NYPD officers he idolizes or uphold the law. Harvey Keitel, Ray Liotta and Robert De Niro star with Peter Berg ("The Last Seduction"), Janeane Garofalo ("The Truth About Cats and Dogs"), Michael Rapaport ("Metro"), Robert Patrick ("T2") and Annabella Sciorra ("The Funeral"). James Mangold ("Heavy") directs and scripts; Cary Woods ("Citizen Ruth"), Cathy Konrad ("Beautiful Girls") and Ezra Swedlow ("Waiting to Exhale") produces. (Miramax, 8/1)

Exploitips: A Cannes debut was nixed, because (per Miramax) the film wasn't ready. Some Hollywood scuttlebutt hasn't been all positive, but the heavyweight cast here should make weekend #1 a solid bet. The key competition for the likely male demo is "Event Horizon"; expect this to skew slightly older, with the teens and twenties heading for the sci-fi flick.

port of the Nazis during WWII made him a controversial figure. The film tracks his turbulent family life and unusual persona. Ghita Norby co-stars; Jan Troell ("The Emigrants") directs; Per Olov Enquist scripts; Erik Crone produces. (First Run, 8/6 NY)

Exploitips: Our Montreal critic (March 1997 issue) gave this Norwegian- and German-language effort 3 1/2 stars, citing its top performances and atmospheric richness. It's the week's only foreign-language fare.

AUGUST 8

Desperate Measures

In this suspense thriller, police officer Frank Conner ("Night Falls on Manhattan's" Andy Garcia) must find a bone marrow donor for his dying son. The only match is a vicious murderer ("Multiplicity's" Michael Keaton, in a change-of-pace role) who plans to use the hospital setting to escape. Connor must both protect and contain the killer. Barbet Schroeder ("Single White Female") directs; David Klass, Henry Bean ("Internal Affairs") and Neal Jimenez ("Anaconda") script; Schroeder produces with Susan Hoffman (also "SWF"), Lee Rich and Gary Foster ("Tin Cup"). (TriStar, 8/8)

Exploitips: Schroeder's recent efforts haven't been blockbusters—a commodity that the talented Garcia still lacks. The family/peril narrative, as variously used in the likes of "Ransom," "Cape Fear" and "The Hand That Rocks the Cradle," can be the genre's strongest, however, and as such those elements in the storyline should be played up here—especially given that the least family-oriented demo, male youths, will likely be out to "Spawn," so this one will trend older.

Spawn

Six years after his murder, government agent Al Simmons (Michael Jai White) returns to Earth as Spawn, a man with supernatural powers. Though he longs to avenge his own death, Spawn must choose between revenge or saving his loved ones from the menacing Violator ("The Pest's" John Leguizamo). Mark Dippe directs this adaptation of Todd McFarlane's comic book; Clint Goldman and Steve Williams produce. (New Line, 8/8)

Exploitips: Expect "Mortal Kombat"-like numbers and gender—i.e., youthful males who read comic books and love sci-fi. This is the genre fare at which New Line excels, so expect assured distributor support. Prize drawings for comic books would nab interest.

Free Willy 3

In this third go about a boy and his whale, Jesse (again Jason James Richter) is a 17-year-old whale tracker. When illegal whaling operations threaten the lives of orca pal Willy and his family, Jesse teams with the 10-year-old son of the illegal whaler to save the day. August Schellenberg and Annie Corley again co-star. Sam Pillsbury ("Starlight Hotel") directs; John Mattson ("Milk Money") scripts; Jennie Lew Tugend again produces. (Warner, 8/8)

Exploitips: Although not a critical failure, part 2 didn't generate much audience enthusiasm (just $30.1 million), so this has a hill to climb—and "Air Bud" might seem like a fresh alternative to a well-worn tale. Also, as Richter and his original "Free Willy" audience ages, the latter will be less interested in such a homespun narrative, and the single-digit set might see this as a tale for teenagers. But there can be presold strength in such a brand name.

Air Bud

Twelve-year-old Josh (Kevin Zegers) is the shy, sad new kid in town whose father has recently died. Buddy is the runaway golden retriever with an incredible hook shot. The two meet, become fast friends and join the school basketball team. But Buddy's extraordinary ability causes a media frenzy that leads his nasty former owner, Norm Snively ("The Fisher King's" Michael Jeter), to come looking for him. Wendy Makkena ("Sister Act"), Eric Christmas and Bill Cobbs co-star. Charles Martin Smith directs; Paul Tamasy and Aaron Mendelsohn script; Robert Vince and William Vince produce. (Buena Vista, 8/8)

Exploitips: The plus here is the Disney imprimatur, the closest thing to a sure thing in kids flickery. But a tale of a basketball-playing dog sounds like Flubber-era Disney live action, hijinkery that'll play these days only to early preteeners. Parents are unlikely to attend, instead opting to take kith and kin to a title more age-malleable. That could be "Free Willy 3" or "Napolean," but the real advantage could go to weekend #2 of "Leave It to Beaver," absent critical skinning.

Napolean

This live-action film about a golden retriever puppy is set in the Australian wilderness, where the curious Napolean (voiced by "The Doctor's" Adam Wylie) is taken when he slips into a hot-air balloon. There, he befriends a parrot named Birdo ("Courage Under Fire's" Bronson Pinchot), who helps guide him in the right direction. Wendy Makkena (also "Air Bud") voices Napolean's mom; David Ogden Stiers ("The Hunchback of Notre Dame") voices characters called Owl and Koala; and Joan Rivers does Mother Penguin. Mario Andreacchio directs, scripts (with Mark Saltzman and producer Michael Bourchier) and produces. (Goldwyn, 8/8 ltd)

Exploitips: Any voiceover live-action pet film will have to compete in audience minds with "Babe." This film, two years on the Goldwyn slate, is of the traditional, unlipsynched variety. Still, one can expect that a Goldwyn children's film would be different than a Disney children's film, and if so critical response could aid this release's later expansion. A careful adoption/pet care tie-in with the local SPCA could generate stronger family turnout.

Career Girls

Oscar-nominated writer/director Mike Leigh ("Secrets & Lies") turns to lighter, comic territory in a film he says is "about love and youth and sex and memories." Set in London over the course of a weekend, the film follows two young career women as they encounter many of their old college friends 15 years after graduation and examine how all their lives have changed. Katrin Cartlidge (the female lead in Leigh's "Naked") and Lynda Steadman star. Simon Channing-Williams produces. (October, 8/8 NY/LA, 8/15 exp)

Exploitips: The Oscar attention given Leigh's most recent credit will give this a leg up in the arthouse marketplace, in which it faces "In the Company of Men," "Soul in the Hole" and the LA expansion of Trimark's "Box of Moonlight" (see our June issue Trailers), and as such the Leigh name is the salemaker.

In the Company of Men

This black comedy examines the brutalities of '90s corporate culture and love. Chad and Howard are two frustrated white-collar execs who formulate a plan to make themselves feel better: date and dump a young woman who'll never get over it. The frat-style prank soon becomes a serious struggle of hatred, love and manipulation. Aaron Eckhart, Stacy Edwards and Matt Malloy star. Neil LaBute directs and scripts; Mark Archer and Steven Pevner produce. (Sony Classics, 8/8 NY/LA)

Exploitips: This was named best dramatic feature at Sundance and screened in Un Certain Regard at Cannes, two promotable venues. Our Sundance critic wasn't totally persuaded, however; a 2 1/2-star review (see our April 1997 issue) found fault with the film's morality ("not one ounce of moral restitution can be found in the climax"), inconsistent acting and poor production values. Yet the controversy that erupted at Sundance if replicated on release could make this must-see fare for the arthouse-engaged.

Soul in the Hole

Set in the subculture of NYC street basketball, "Soul in the Hole" follows one squad, the Bed-Stuy "Dream Team" called Kenny's Kings, as it plays through a lot hot summer on Brooklyn's asphalt playgrounds. Danielle Gardner directs; Lilibet Foster produces. (Northern Arts, 8/8 NY/LA, wider Sept & Oct)

Exploitips: Loud Records will release the film's soundtrack. More "Hoop Dreams" than "The Mighty Ducks," the film has an emotional focus—the relationship between star point guard Ed "Booger" Smith, thrown out by his mother, and his surrogate father, coach Kenny Jones—that could grab audiences.

AUGUST 15

Excess Baggage

In this action/adventure, Alicia Silverstone ("Batman & Robin") is a lonely rich girl who plans her own kidnapping. She involves an unwitting car thief ("The Usual Suspects'" Benicio del Toro), but her scheme gets out of control and she finds herself on the run from an ex-CIA assassin (Christopher Walken). Harry Connick Jr. ("Copycat"), Jack Thompson ("The Sum of Us") and Nicholas Turturro ("Mac") co-star. Marco Brambilla ("Demolition Man") directs; Max Adams, Dick Clement ("The Commitments") and Ian LaFrenais script; Silverstone produces with former A&M Films exec Bill Borden and Carolyn Kessler. (Columbia, 8/15)

Exploitips: Will Silverstone deliver on her multi-pic pact with Sony? Here's the first test, with the actress far from the comic turf of her fame-making "Clueless." Del Toro is a coming name that could further draw the distaff

LATE MOVIE MOVES...

Shooting Porn

A look at Hollywood's gay porn industry, this Ronnie Larsen documentary is the playwright's first film. It visits two sets, one of director Gino Colbert, the other of Chi Chi LaRue. Porn actors Blue Blake, Bryan Kidd and Adam Rom appear, as do porn reviewers Mickey Skee and David Widmer. Caryn Horwitz and Doug Lindeman produces. (Horwitz, 7/11 NY)

Exploitips: Although our reviewer gave it only one star (see our May 1997 issue), "Shooting Porn" generated interest at the London Lesbian & Gay Film Fest and at Berlin's European Film Market and has an attention-grabbing salaciousness built into its title. The film will play 6/27 at the San Francisco Lesbian & Gay Film Fest and 7/18 at LA's Outfest '97.

Mrs. Brown

This romantic drama tells of the unusual relationship between Queen Victoria ("Hamlet's" Judi Dench) and John Brown ("Indecent Proposal's" Billy Connolly), a Highlander summoned from Balmoral to walk the Queen's pony as she rides in the hope that exercise will help Her Highness recover from the death of Prince Albert. John Madden ("Ethan Frome") directs; Jeremy Brock scripts; Sarah Curtis ("The Englishman Who Went Up a Hill But Came Down a Mountain") produces for Ecosse Films/BBC Scotland with Masterpiece Theatre and Irish Screen. (Miramax, 7/18)

Exploitips: Acquired by Miramax before Cannes, this arrives stateside with that fest's famed imprimatur. For arthouse audiences, the "Ethan Frome" and "The Englishman..." credits of the filmmakers will also be a pull, and it being a period piece won't hinder turnout. Calling "Mrs. Brown" "a beautiful film," Miramax co-head Harvey Weinstein bought both North American and most world rights, so expect solid distributor support.

This World, Then the Fireworks

After as children seeing their father commit a love-triangle killing that left physical and emotional scars on their mother, Marty and Carol Lakewood devotedly protect each other from what Marty calls "a broken world." Grown to adulthood in the late '50s, the two live in a small coastal town, partners in grift and murder, and their mutual devotion has turned erotic. Billy Zane ("The Phantom") and Gina Gershan ("Bound") star with Rue McClanahan, Sheryl Lee ("Bliss") and Seymour Cassel. Michael Oblowitz directs;

Larry Gross ("48HRS.") scripts, and he produces with Chris Hanley and Brad Wyman for Largo. (Orion Classics, 7/18)

Exploitips: The film adapts a 1955 short story of crime writer Jim Thompson that went unpublished until 1983, and the pulp fictioneer's name is revered by the genre's enthusiasts. The eroticism of the material is likely to draw critical and moviegoer attention, rarely a bad thing (Gershon's "Showgirls" being an exception). The film arrives bearing a Sundance imprimatur.

Latin Boys Go to Hell

Set in working-class Brooklyn, this gay fest entry tells the story of a shy 20-year-old (Irwin Ossa) and a savvy Latina charmer (John Bryant Davila). Jenifer Lee Simard and Guinevere Turner ("Go Fish") co-star. Ela Troyano directs, and scripts with Andre Salas; Jurgen Bruning ("Hustler White") produces. (Strand, 7/25 NY/LA)

Exploitips: This will attract a similar demo as "Shooting Porn," and it boasts a similarly salacious title that will attract attention. Positive reviews from the film's fest runs should be pushed.

Wedding Bell Blues

Three women ("Female Perversions'" Paulina Parizkova, "Grace of My Heart's" Illeana Douglas and "Doc Hollywood's" Julie Warner) are turning 30 unmarried. They decide to head to Las Vegas, find husbands, get maried and get divorced, all in 24 hours—just so they can say they weren't spinsters. Dana Lustig makes her directing debut; Annette Goliti-Gutierrez scripts; Ram Bergman & Dana Lustig and Mike Curb & Carole Curb Nemoy produce the BMG acquisition. (Legacy, 6/13 ltd)

Exploitips: Our Seattle/Women in Cinema critic gives this three stars, citing a narrative with "an engaging momentum" and a cast that provides "superb performances" in "an above-average romantic comedy laden with well-delivered yuks that also has something smart to say about aging, relationships and the pressure on women to marry young." The obvious demo: twenty- and thirtysomething females, so play up the leads and the storyline.

demo—and most guys will be happy to watch Silverstone for two hours. Expect this to be the date-night choice for the weekend.

A Smile Like Yours

This romantic comedy stars "Dear God's" Greg Kinnear and "Turbulence's" Lauren Holly as a young married couple struggling to juggle their careers and have a baby. But a beauty (Jill Hennessy) and a tycoon (Christopher McDonald, also in "Leave It to Beaver") bring outside pressures to the duo's happy marriage. Joan Cusack ("Grosse Pointe Blank") and Jay Thomas co-star. Rysher CEO Keith Samples makes his directing debut, and he scripts with Kevin Meyer; David Kirkpatrick ("The Evening Star") and Tony Amatullo produce. (Paramount, 8/15)

Exploitips: Even if Samples as a director proves to be a good CEO, "A Smile Like Yours" has engaging leads that could provide older couples a weekend alternative to the younger-skewing "Excess Baggage." (It also has a more attractive title.) But August, not April, can be exhibition's cruelest month, and the key is to attract the parent-age demo otherwise busy with family vacations. Try a contest awarding the couple with the best smiles.

Steel

NBA phenom Shaquille O'Neal ("Kazaam") stars as metals specialist John Henry Irons, who develops a top-secret weapon. But his duplicitous nemesis, Nathaniel Burke ("New Jack City's" Judd Nelson), uses it to arm street thugs, and he plans to sell the weapon to international terrorists. Aided by friends and family, Irons creates an alter-ego superhero: Steel. Annabeth Gish ("The Last Supper"), Richard Roundtree and Irma P. Hall co-star. Kenneth Johnson ("Short Circuit II") directs and scripts; music maven Quincy Jones produces with David Salzman and Joel Simon ("Hard to Kill"). (Warner, 8/15)

Exploitips: At $18 million in boxoffice, O'Neal's "Kazaam" didn't overfill Disney's coffers, and Warner must hope that "Steel" has more legs than the Lakers did in the playoffs. "Steel" seems aimed a little higher in age bracket, and though little kids idolize Shaq that could lend this project more consideration from moviegoers. Still, the likely attendees will be dad and son—hardcore action fans are unlikely to buy in here—so tout the O'Neal name to draw his NBA watchers.

She's So Lovely

"Dead Man Walking's" Sean Penn and "Moll Flanders'" Robin Wright co-star as crazy-in-love Eddie and Maureen. When a neighbor attacks Maureen, Eddie's response lands him in jail for 10 years. On his return, he finds Maureen is now remarried to the affectionate Joey (John Travolta), leaving Maureen torn between past and present, passion and love. Gena Rowlands co-stars. Nick Cassavetes ("Unhook the Stars") directs a script written by his father, the legendary John Cassavetes; Rene Cleitman (also "Unhook the Stars") produces. (Miramax, 8/15)

Exploitips: Aka "She's De Lovely," the film has a publicity-attracting duo in the married Penn and Wright, and the narrative favors them. But the celebrity here is Travolta, returning to the MiramaxLand that relaunched his career with "Pulp Fiction." And, however compassionate his role is, he's the interloper. The casting would be stronger in the Hollywood sense if the boys had switched their parts. But so be it; after all, it's John Cassavetes material. One can expect mano-a-mano sparks from Penn and Travolta in any case.

How to Be a Player

Philandering ladies man Dray Jackson (Bill Bellamy, best known from the cable show "MTV Jams") has his playboy life disrupted by, of all things, the anthropology project of his sister ("B.A.P.S.'" Natalie Desselle), who sets out to break the predatory habits of the male. Pierre Edwards, Lark Voorhies and Mari Morrow ("Virtuosity") co-star. Lionel C. Martin directs; Mark Brown and Demetria Johnson script; Mark Burg, Todd Baker, Preston Holmes, Stan Lathan and Russell Simmons produce. (Gramercy, 8/15)

Exploitips: Despite the comeuppance storyline, "How to Be a Player" is likely to draw the urban male demo; if the Showest trailer emphasized any studies, it was only the Book of Love, as written by horny males at that.

The Full Monty

Strapped for cash, six out-of-work steelworkers form a ragtag band of strippers to make ends meet. Robert Carlyle ("Trainspotting") stars as Gaz, a wild card who persuades best friend Dave and a former foreman to be part of an act that culminates with "the full monty"—baring it all. Mark Addy, William Snape, Steve Huison, Tom Wilkinson, Paul Barber and Hugo Speer co-star. Peter Cattaneo directs; Simon Beaufoy scripts; Uberto Pasolini ("Palookaville") produces. (Fox Searchlight, 8/15 NY/LA, 8/29 exp)

Exploitips: Our critic accorded this a four-star review (see our April 1997 issue), calling it "a gender-reversed 'Striptease' with the comedy intact" and praising the cast for "performances with admirable charisma and pathos." Although Miramax co-head Harvey Weinstein recently characterized Fox Searchlight as "10 disasters in a row," this—like its Cannes-praised "Ice Storm"—is likely to put the gleam back into Searchlight.

Different for Girls

In this romantic comedy (held from June), when childhood best friends Paul and Karl meet 20 years later, the heterosexual Paul is sexually attracted to his old pal—because Karl has become Kim. When Paul learns Kim's identity, he decides to wreck Kim's life. Rupert Graves ("Intimate Relations"), Steven Mackintosh ("London Kills Me") and Saskia Reeves ("Butterfly Kiss") star. Richard Spence directs; Tony Marchant scripts; John Chapman produces. (First Look, 8/15 ltd)

Exploitips: The gender-bender storyline isn't new, but it continues to draw. "Different for Girls" received the Montreal fest's Grand Prix of the Americas award for best film, a citable award for arthouse auds.

Bandwagon

Four kids form a rock band and hit the road in this slacker rock comedy. Kevin Corrigan ("Walking and Talking"), Steve Parlavecchio, Lee Holmes, Matthew Hennesey and Doug MacMillan star. John Schultz ("The Making of Jurassic Park") directs and scripts, and he produces with Alyson Poole. (CFP, 8/15 ltd)

Exploitips: Our Ft. Lauderdale critic in a 3 1/2-star review (see our April 1997 issue) citably called this "a fresh, witty road movie."

AUGUST 22

Money Talks

A small-time con artist ("The Fifth Element's" Chris Tucker) is wrongly blamed for a police killing. Suddenly notorious, he can rely only on the help of an annoying reporter ("Shadow Conspiracy's" Charlie Sheen). Brett Ratner directs; "Toy Story" co-writers Joel Cohen and Alec Sokolow script this action comedy with Vince McKewin; Walter Coblenz ("The Babe") produces. See our Sneak Preview in the June 1997 issue. (New Line, 8/22)

Exploitips: Bouncing around on the NLC slate (first 7/18, then 10/1, now 8/22), "Money Talks" has had its salability hefted a notch by Tucker's attention-grabbing turn in "The Fifth Element." The presence of the "Toy Story" scenarists could portend a decent comedy.

Sunday

Struggling, middle-aged actress Madeleine mistakes Oliver, a homeless casualty of corporate downsizing, for an acclaimed art-film director. Oliver grabs the opportunity to reinvent himself, even if only for one day. David Suchet ("Executive Decision") and Lisa Harrow ("The Last Days of Chez Nous") star with Jared Harris ("I Shot Andy Warhol") and Larry Pine. Jonathan Nossiter directs, and he scripts with James Lasdun; Nossiter and Aliz Madigan produce. (CFP, 8/22 NY/LA)

Exploitips: Yet another sign of the ascendance of CFP, "Sunday" won the grand jury prize at Sundance. Our Cannes critic rated it at four stars, saying the two leads give "powerfully honest and risky performances."

AUGUST 29

Hoodlum

This gritty crime drama stars Laurence Fishburne (also in this month's "Event Horizon") as upstart gangster Bumpy Johnson, who faces off with the famed Dutch Schultz ("Rob Roy's" Tim Roth) for control of Harlem in the '30s. Andy Garcia (also in "Desperate Measures") stars as Lucky Luciano. Vanessa Williams ("Eraser"), Clarence Williams III, William Atherton, Queen Latifah and Cicely Tyson co-star. Bill Duke ("A Rage in Harlem") directs; Chris Brancato scripts; Frank Mancuso, Jr. ("Species") produces. (UA, 8/29)

Exploitips: Because of New Line's move of "Boogie Nights," "Hoodlum" faces some male-demo and urban-aud competition. This UA project has a higher-profile cast, however, and its wide break means the promotional push will be more intensive this weekend.

Dead Man On Campus

The second MTV film (the first was "Beavis and Butt-head Do America" finds two freshmen resorting to arcana to win good grades. Tom Everett Scott ("That Thing You Do!") and Mark-Paul Gosselaar star. Alan Cohn directs; Michael Traeger and Michael White script; and Gale Anne Hurd produces for her Pacific Western Prods. (Paramount, 8/29)

Exploitips: The scenario could seem a salve to Ivy-returning students, and one can expect wall-to-wall promotion on MTV.

Boogie Nights

This dark comedy follows a group of filmmakers hoping to revamp the XXX industry. Mark Wahlberg, Julianne Moore, Burt Reynolds, Don Cheadle, William H. Macy, Heather Graham and John C. Reilly star. Paul Thomas Anderson ("Hard Eight") directs, scripts and produces. (New Line, 8/29 ltd, 9/5 wide)

Exploitips: As it did for "The People vs. Larry Flynt" (for good or ill), the XXX setting will draw this extra attention, but the cast talents are also salable. New Line moved this from an early summer bow.

Operation Condor

In this comic adventure (aka "Armor of God 2"), Hong Kong superstar Jackie Chan races mercenaries across three continents to a trove of gold hidden by the Nazis during WWII. A wind tunnel fight sequence is a comic masterpiece. Carol Cheng, Eva Cobo De Garcia and Ikeda Shoko co-star; Chan and Edward Tang ("Rumble in the Bronx") script; Leonard Ho ("Supercop") produces. (Miramax, 8/29)

Exploitips: The more recent "First Strike" made $14 million, "Supercop" $15 million; early 1996's "Rumble in the Bronx" did $30 million. To reverse that trend, position this as an exotic "Raiders of the Lost Ark." Emphasize Chan's directing and co-scripting roles to lend this film event status for the already converted. Miramax moved this from May.

Kull the Conqueror

Based on Robert E. Howard's '30s pulp fiction hero, "Kull the Conqueror" follows the adventures of a slave soldier (Kevin Sorbo of the syndication smash "Hercules: The Legendary Journeys") turned king. Tia Carrere ("High School High"), Thomas Ian Griffith ("Excessive Force"), Karina Lombard ("Legends of the Fall"), Litefoot ("The Indian in the Cupboard") and Harvey Fierstein ("Independence Day") co-star. John Nicollela ("The Fan", 1981) directs; Charles Edward Pogue ("Dragonheart") and Don Mancini (the "Child's Play" series) script; Raffaella De Laurentiis (also "Dragonheart") produces. (Universal, 8/29)

Exploitips: The similar role for Sorbo means this could pull his TV legions; the Howard name retains a young-male following. The PG-13 rating is demo-friendly.

AUGUST UNDATED

Masterminds

After being expelled from the Shady Glen School by the principal ("A Time to Kill's" Brenda Fricker), 14-year-old Ozzie ("Alaska's" Vincent Kartheiser) decides to play one more practical joke. But, when he ventures into the school basement to do the deed, he learns the security guard ("Star Trek: First Contact's" Patrick Stewart) has taken all the students hostage. That leaves just Ozzie and his penchant for pranks to lead the kids to triumph. Roger Christian ("The Sender") directs; Floyd Byars ("Mindwalk"), Alex Siskin and Chris Black script; Byars produces with Robert Dudelson. (Triumph, August)

Exploitips: Held from late May, "Masterminds" now lands just before classes begin again—perhaps not as propitious timing, student psychology wise. New catchline: "Got school? Here's your hero."

Dirty Dancing

Patrick Swayze stars in this reissue of the 1987 hit as the dance instructor who makes the Catskills summer of a coming-of-age girl (Jennifer Grey) into the time of her life. Jerry Orbach, Cynthia Rhodes and Jack Weston co-star; the late Emile Ardolino directs. (Live, August)

Exploitips: Aside from "Star Wars," reprises draw only limited attendance. Emphasize the vacation element to interest young females.

Gravesend

This low-budget drama traces the events in the lives of four teenage friends over the course of one tragic night. Sal Stabile makes his feature directing debut. (Manga, August)

Exploitips: The odd title and under-20 storyline could capture the interest of out-of-school young males looking for escape from hot August nights.

SUMMER '97 PROMO GUIDE

Promotional tie-ins to the biggest summer movies

Herc and Megara from Buena Vista's "Hercules."

BUENA VISTA

Buena Vista has launched another of its famed Mega Mall tours to tout "Hercules," Disney's summer animation event for '97. The five-month, 20-city tour highlights the art of animation through live demonstrations, stage performances and interactive games. There's a live stage show; a miniature carousel themed to Baby Pegasus; a workshop where participants can draw Hercules; and Hercules-themed game booths and prizes. Sponsored by Chevy Venture, the event also includes a Chevy Venture minivan giveaway in each market. Mattel is manufacturing such action figures as Hydra-Slaying Hercules; Head-Butting Phil; Lightning Bolt Zeus; Fireball-Shooting Hades; a Cyclops; and a Hydra that sprouts new heads when you chop one off. "Hercules" will also be promoted from here to Mt. Olympus through a tie-in with McDonald's, with the fast-food chain offering figurines of the heroic demigod, his cohorts and his nemeses.

McDonald's will also promote Buena Vista's "George of the Jungle," a live-action version of Jay Ward's '60s cartoon parody of Tarzan. Customers will be invited to "Swing into McDonald's and Watch Out For That Treeeeat...". The merchandise safari also includes children's apparel from Allison Manufacturing; sportswear from Jerry Leigh; neckwear and boxers from MJC; trading cards from Upper Deck; T-shirts from Stanley De Santis; footwear from Pagoda; and jungle blankets and throws from Beacon Manufacturing.

COLUMBIA

"ID4" star Will Smith will again tussle with aliens this fourth of July weekend, this time in "Men In Black," in which he co-stars as J opposite Tommy Lee Jones, who plays K. They're both MIBs–special agents who monitor extraterrestrial activity and keep it under control–which isn't always easy, judging from some of the toys being offered by Galoob. First there's Alien Ambush J vs. Tree Trunk Alien. "There's a secret alien hidden inside the tree trunk...Pose J to blast 'em out!" Then there's Slime Fighting K vs. Edgar. "K's being slimed by the hidden alien!" And Steel Striker K vs. Manhole Cover Alien–well, that doesn't even require an explanation, does it? Galoob will also release MIB Micro Machine scale miniatures. Over 30 other licensees are on board for this event picture, including Aladdin Industries (lunch boxes); American Needle (baseball caps); Changes Inc. (T-shirts, sweatshirts and tank tops); Disguise Inc. (costumes, masks, make-up and Halloween accessories); Ero Industries Inc. (sleeping bags and play tents); Foot-Tec Industries Inc. (children's footwear); GTE Entertainment (CD-ROM games); Impact (backpacks and wallets); Inkworks (trading cards and stickers); Jay Franco & Sons Inc. (beach towels); Marvel Comics (comic books); Microgames of America (walkie-talkies); OSP Publishing Inc. (posters); Party Professionals (masks); Revell-Monogram (model kits); and Tiger Electronics (LCD hand-held games). For MIB wanna-bes, there will be an "Official Men In Black Agent's Manual" from Newmarket Press.

Slippers featuring characters from Buena Vista's "George of the Jungle."

Slime-Fighting K of Columbia's "Men In Black."

FOX

20th Century Fox will be pulling out all the stops to promote "Anastasia," the first film from the studio's new animation division. Meg Ryan voices the title character in this animated musical about an amnesiac girl who might be the daughter of Russia's last czar. Galoob Toys has designed a fashion doll with a rags-to-riches wardrobe, from a tattered blouse and skirt outfit to a gorgeously ornate ball gown. Burger King will offer premiums based on the film's characters, and Pizza Hut, Nabisco, Kraft Foods, PepsiCo and Coca-Cola will also have tie-ins. Other companies Fox has pacted with for "Anastasia" include Applause (plush dolls); Disguise Inc. (costumes and masks); ERO Industries Inc. (sleeping bags and play tents); Fruit of the Loom (children's underwear); Harper Collins (storybooks); Kid Duds (sleepwear); Tiger Electronics (hand-held games); Tyco/ViewMaster (3-D ViewMaster reel cards); and Warren Industries (board games and jigsaw puzzles). And the music box Anastasia treasures will be recreated in several sizes by SF Music Box, and will play the film's haunting melody "Once Upon a December."

NEW LINE

"Spawn," a sci-fi action film based on the popular Image Comics superhero, will be promoted by a Sony Playstation tie-in and a sweepstakes in Wizard Magazine. Starring Martin Sheen, John Leguizamo and Michael Jai White, "Spawn" is "the story of the ultimate war between good and evil." McFarlane Toys is the toy licensee.

The heroine of Fox's "Anastasia" in her ball gown.

PARAMOUNT

Playmates Toys will manufacture a line of fairy dolls for Paramount's "Fairy Tale...A True Story." Rubie's Costume Company will create Halloween costumes, make-up, masks, boxed costume sets, jewelry, wings and accessories. Raweliffe Corp. will produce resin and pewter figurines. Gilbertie's Natural Fragrances will offer aromatherapy and beauty care products, and the Signature Group will provide women's embroidered denim shirts, T-shirts, baseball caps, nightshirts and mugs.

TRISTAR

An intergalactic battle with alien insects–it has all the elements for a winning promotional smorgasbord. Galoob Toys will manufacture action figures of "Starship Troopers'" heroes and villains, and their futuristic weapons and combat vehicles. GB Posters & Publications will offer posters of the film, and Spectrum Holobyte will develop interactive CD-ROM entertainment software that will mirror the atmosphere and action of the movie.

UNIVERSAL

Judging from "Jurassic Park's" boxoffice receipts, its sequel, "The Lost World," should be the "monster" hit of the summer. And more than two dozen toy licensees will contribute to the film's Dino-Might performance. Promotional partners include Kenner (action figures), Parker Bros. (board games), Laramie (Super Soaker guns), Tyco (radio controlled cars), DreamWorks Interactive (CD-ROMs), Sega of America (electronic games), Fruit of the Loom (children's underwear) and MCI (prepaid phone cards). Burger King will be the exclusive restaurant promotional tie-in partner, offering merchandise based on the dinosaurs and their human adversaries. Mercedes-Benz is also on board, promoting their new M-Class All-Activity vehicle, which is featured in the film. And General Mills cereals such as Trix, Cocoa Puffs, Golden Grahams and Cinnamon Toast Crunch make this offer: "If you hear this box ROAR, you could win a Lost World Adventure!" A mechanical device that makes a roaring sound, activated when a winning box is opened, indicates that the boxholder is the recipient of the grand prize–a trip to New Zealand and Australia for eight people and up to $24,000 in cash–or one of 10,000 first prizes, including Lost World backpacks, walkie-talkies and binoculars. General Mills has also introduced a "Collector's Edition" cereal called Jurassic Park Crunch, complete with mini-marshmallows shaped like Raptors and hatching eggs.

WARNER BROS.

With a cast of megastars including George Clooney, Chris O'Donnell, Arnold Schwarzenegger, Uma Thurman and Alicia Silverstone, "Batman and Robin" hardly needs promoting. But that won't stop Warner Bros., which has teamed with numerous companies to drive consumers batty. More than 100 million boxes of Kellogg's cereal will feature commemorative boxes and giveaways. Taco Bell will offer premiums; Frito-Lay will have "Bat"-themed bags and a sweepstakes game; Kraft will ice the popsicle competition with Mr. Freeze juice bars; and Brach will sell candy in the shape of the movie's characters. Kenner is the master toy licensee.

State of the art

ESP-3 Electronic System Platter

Our new platters have re-defined the standard for electronically detecting film position. The new state of the art ESP-3 Electronic System Platter, uses a patented application sensing system for control of both film position and platter speed. Other features include one-handed threading, automatic switching from take-up to feed-out and electronic over feed control that eliminates the possibility of film wrap. Visual status controls, easy platter disengagement and many other small touches, make the ESP the most operator friendly system on the market today.

Also, offered in the CFS/Rentec lineup is the newly redesigned NSP-3. This electro/mechanical platter is a completely updated version of the tried and true Super Platter. The NSP-3 is the most price competitive platter manufactured in the U.S.

Innovation is our mission

Cinema Film Systems/Rentec is the motion-picture industry's most innovative, technologically advanced systems manufacturer. We offer state of the art lamphouse consoles from 1.6 to 15 KW, film handling systems, automations and a full variety of sound systems, screens and various other support components from leading manufacturers throughout the world. In fact, we pioneered this system packaging concept, which has proven its value in theaters around the world.

BIG IN JAPAN

The Opening of Kobe's MOVIX Rokko Kicks Off Cinemark's Pact With Shochiku by Christine James

As American exhibitors expand their companies further and further across the globe, they're finding there's one thing all their stateside success and experience can't assuage: culture shock. There will always remain unknown elements in any foreign marketplace a given company ventures into. And those variables could decide the success or failure of an enterprise.

Take real estate. Where are the best locations? Where do the local people congregate? What's a fair price to pay? And business. Which companies are reputable? Who produces the best-quality products? And aesthetics. What architecture, environments, styles and colors appeal to this population? Even food. Will salted popcorn go over here, or is pickled squid the cinematic delicacy of this particular region?

The answer, most circuits have found, is to team up with a strategic partner that has the contacts and knows the ins and outs. That's what Cinemark International, Cinemark's transcontinentally-focused subsidiary, decided to do when the company set its sights on Japan. Cinemark International's president, Tim Warner, ultimately chose Shochiku, a 103-year-old entertainment company that's the largest in Japan. And one of its holdings is Shochiku Multiplex Theatres, the second largest exhibition company in Japan. Under the pact, Shochiku Cinemark Theatres (SCT) plans to build 100 screens in Japan by the year 2000.

I LIKE TO MOVIX: The exterior of the complex in which Shochiku Cinemark Theatres' MOVIX Rokko is housed.

"I knew [Shochiku president and CEO] Toru Okuyama for a number of years through my involvement with NATO/ShoWest, and was aware of both the quality and status of his company in Japan," says Warner, who resigned from his position as general chairman of NATO/ShoWest last year to join Cinemark. "And I suggested to him when I took my current position as the president of Cinemark International that he might want to consider doing a joint venture."

Warner points out that while their competitors in Japan—AMC, UCI (a partnership between Paramount and Universal), and Time Warner-owned Warner International—have local joint venture partners, they're not with companies in the entertainment or exhibition business. "I think the advantage for us is having a joint venture partner that is in day-to-day exhibition," he notes. "They have excellent knowledge and relationships in the marketplace, and I think it will enable us to build our circuit much faster than the other competing circuits."

"There's nothing like having someone that knows the market well, and they do," says Cinemark's director of corporate development Randy Hester. "It's a unique market, it's a huge market. And it's always advantageous to have someone that knows it."

Of course, Cinemark brings something to the table too. "We bring our knowledge of both the domestic and international marketplace, technology, and expertise," says Warner, who adds that SCT management will be trained in Dallas, where Cinemark is based.

"We've got some experience that they don't have," comments Hester. "We've grown our company from a pretty small regional operation to a nationwide and international company. And we've got some unique ideas about theatre design and about operations and customer service that they saw and they liked."

Shochiku and Cinemark together have 53 percent interest in SCT (meaning each has 26.5 percent). The remaining 47 percent is held by "large, prominent Japanese corporations, which will also assist to move the development forward," according to Warner.

Rather than use the cumbersome company name of Shochiku Cinemark Theatres, the theatres themselves will be called MOVIX. "Shochiku has had that name for their drive-in theatres, so the name has been in Japan, linked with the exhibition business, for a number of years," says Warner.

MOVIX intends to provide Japan's theatregoers with the state-of-the-art multiplexes that are so prevalent in America. The first theatre under Cinemark and Shochiku's partnership was the seven-plex MOVIX Rokko in Kobe, which opened its doors March 20. "It's been doing very well, and it was extremely well-received by the community. Business has been very, very good," says Warner.

"The theatre is built in a spectacular new mall development on Rokko Fashion Island," he continues. "The shopping center itself is really futuristic-looking. And the theatre has 1,550 seats with THX auditoriums and a very state-of-the-art modern design."

The opening was celebrated with three days of activities, including a VIP opening attended by about 600 guests, as well a special event for local residents and the media, followed by a grand opening for the general public. "As people walked through the theatres, they were very impressed," says Warner. "They were especially impressed by the size of the concession stand versus those in traditional Japanese theatres, and that the theatre also contains a cafe where people can have coffee and drinks and sandwiches and pastry items. And for Japan, where space is at a premium, the lobby and the auditoriums are very, very spacious. This theatre was built to a world standard, where it's a great theatre in any country of the world."

MOVIX Rokko's concession stand.

The differences between a Cinemark theatre in Japan and one in the States are minimal. "As we continue to develop the projects, there will be fewer differences," says Warner. "But of course there will be allowances for local cultural preferences in [such aspects as] colors and design. But the type of operation and the general layout of the theatres will be very similar to the quality that we're building here in the U.S."

"We'll blend the Shochiku and the Cinemark way of doing things and create a chain of theatres that will be unique and will satisfy what [Japanese patrons are] looking for," says Hester. "We're talking bigger, we're talking the kind of amenities that people have come to expect here in the United States."

When investigating a new market, one might not consider that, for example, certain colors are preferred by certain cultures. There are other differences, too. "The concession operations—although the designs are the same, the actual products that would be sold in the stand might be completely different," Warner remarks. "And so there's a big adjustment to local taste in both the design and stocking the products. For Japan, one of their snacks is a candied squid. That's something I hadn't seen in the U.S.!"

Warner acknowledges that doing business in Japan is "a tremendous cultural challenge for an American company, and the merging of the two cultures, both the Japanese culture and the U.S. culture, is a major challenge." But all the pertinent statistics reveal that the Japanese market is well worth it. "Right now, [Japan has about] one screen for every hundred and some thousand people [in contrast to America's one for every 10,000], and yet it's still one of the primary markets outside of the U.S. for U.S. [film product.]"

"Culturally, their love of entertainment is very similar to ours," Hester agrees. "They love entertainment that comes from Hollywood. What we're trying to do is provide them opportunities to enjoy it. It's that simple."

Shochiku Cinemark Theatres, or MOVIX, will average between 10 and 16 screens, which is huge by Japan's standards. Their next theatre will be a 12-plex in Kyoto.

Real estate in Japan is notoriously expensive and scarce. With AMC, Warner and UCI building, securing well-positioned sites will require a solid strategy. "Having our joint venture is going to be an advantage, because we are dealing with a company that has literally done business in Japan for over 103 years," notes Warner. "We're counting on the fact that they do know the local market and the local developers. And I think that they will bring with them access to the marketplace.

"The average ticket price in Japan is much, much higher than in the U.S., almost two or three times as high," adds Warner. "It's a very upscale market when you look at the ticket price. And they enjoy movies very much, and also enjoy American culture. I think as the market develops, the potential of the marketplace is probably one of the best in the entire world."

But that's not to say Cinemark is slowing down its expansion into other world markets—quite the opposite. At the end of this year, 20 to 25 percent of Cinemark's screens will be international, according to Warner, and future building will be about 50/50 domestic and international. "We're still building very aggressively in the U.S. [In 1998], we'll open over 200 screens in countries outside the U.S., and in the U.S. we will [also] open over 200 screens."

The global marketplace is full of opportunities, says Hester. "International markets aren't as mature as the United States, which does create opportunity," he explains. "It also creates some risk. It is not simple. It takes a lot of effort, and it takes a considerable amount of time and energy. The rewards are the same as they are here. We have a huge population around the world that in many cases is not served adequately through theatres. And we're going to do our best to try to remedy that."

PLEX-MEX

From 0 to 100 Screens in Less Than Two Years, Cinemex Heats Up the Mexican Market

by Jose Martinez

POLISHED PRESENTATION: The entrance to Cinemex's Santa Fe 14-plex.

Stadium-style theatre seats, digital sound, fully-automated telephone ticketing and information services, and world class acoustical standards are taken for granted in the United States. But these innovations have been taking Mexico City by storm—ever since Cinemex opened the doors of its first theatre in August 1995.

Founded in January 1994, Cinemex is a first-run multiplex theatrical exhibitor focusing on the movie marketplace in Mexico's capital city. Cinemex originated as a business project for three Harvard students whose formula went on to win Harvard Business School's two business plan awards in 1993. The company, which employs a staff of 45 at its head office and 485 at its cinemas, was formed by managing partners Miguel Angel Davila (age 31), director of operations and finance; Adolfo Fastlicht (30), director of real estate development and new projects; and Matthew Heyman (35), director of programming and strategic planning. (Of the three young entrepreneurs, Heyman is the only one with prior experience in the exhibition industry, having formerly served as vice president of business affairs at Toronto-based Cineplex Odeon).

Already Mexico's second-largest cinema operator in terms of boxoffice, Cinemex represents 22 percent and 30 percent of the region's attendance and boxoffice, respectively. Ramirez is currently the largest chain in Mexico, and Cinemark is the second largest by screen count. UA has also recently entered the newly-hot market, and others are circling. But Heyman's not worried. "People used to say to Ramirez, 'Who do you think is your competitor?' And I think he used to say Cinemark. I think that everybody now looks more to us."

By the year 2000, Cinemex plans to have from 350 to 380 screens throughout Mexico

Response No. 99

THE ART OF THE DEAL: Cinemex has risen in the ranks of exhibition by bringing state-of-the-art technology and design to Mexico City, as exemplified by the spacious lobby of the Cinemex Loreto, which features neon-framed poster cases and a ceiling-mounted multi-screen video wall.

City. "The plan is to build as many screens as we can in Mexico City. Focus, focus, focus," says Heyman. "Keep our eye on the ball, understanding that half the economy takes place in Mexico City. One-quarter of the population lives in Mexico City and the cosmopolitan area."

The company's plan is not to have the finest theatres in Mexico, but the finest anywhere. "Every theatre we're building now is 100 percent digital. We're going back and retrofitting a lot of theatres to make them digital. We have only one goal—to be the best in the world. We're not here to be the best in Mexico. We're here to set the standard for everything."

The company has achieved the industry's highest average ticket price by developing state-of-the-art multiplexes and exceeding customers' theatregoing expectations. "The quality of theatres was so poor [before Cinemex entered the market] that it was easy to raise the bar," Heyman explains. "The relative comparison was really fast. [People] came in and said, 'We've never seen anything like this except in the U.S.'"

And the public is willing to pay for quality. Regarding customers' reaction to Cinemex's higher ticket prices, Heyman says, "We have really incredible, committed, and loyal customers. They never complained once."

Heyman knows the ingredients that go into a successful theatre. "I look for good sight lines, clean service. The big thing for me is the quality of the presentation, the sound, and the cleanliness of the building. Those are the things you notice first. The decor package and the way the theatre looks are fundamental to the whole thing."

The company's multiplex philosophy incorporates the industry's highest technological standards and first-class service to create Mexico's premier moviegoing experience—a concept Cinemex calls La Magia del Cine (The Magic of Cinema). They also have developed their own acoustical standard, Sonido Cinemex, in an effort to further differentiate its cinemas from new and existing competitors. "Sonido Cinemex is our own acoustical standard," says Heyman. "We match THX standard in every single theatre." Cinemex also utilizes a phone service, Linea Cinemex, through which customers can reserve their tickets in advance. Some sites offer patrons a liquor bar with draft beer and a coffee bar, as well as the standard assortment of movie food, and a special pick-'n'-mix bulk candy setup called La Locura—which means "The Craziness." In keeping with the philosophy that the partners have created a brand name, all Cinemex innovations are trademarked.

The company was formed at a time when people predicted Mexico was on the verge of becoming a first-world country. Instead, what occurred was a meltdown of the Mexican economy. "We opened all our buildings during the worst time. The devaluation hit and saved our ass," Heyman recounts. "We couldn't compete because we had no buildings. We opened seven buildings in 14 months because everyone else was scared. We opened some great theatres."

At present, Cinemex has 10 multiplexes with 101 screens. Currently open are the Alavista 6; the Santa Fe 14; the Manacar 9; the Los Reyes 10; the Loreto 10; the Perinorte 12; and the Masaryk 4. (The last is also known as the Casa de Arte, and is one of Mexico's few art-houses.) Coming up are the Cinemex Galerias 14; the Toluca 14; the San Mateo 12; the Villa Coapa 11 and the Universidad 14. Heyman and his partners are already working on expanding Cinemex's scope. "I think the second phase of Cinemex will be an acquisition phase that will not necessarily occur in Mexico City. It could occur in Latin America. The goal is to create an incredible market share in Mexico City and then leverage that market share elsewhere."

One aspect Cinemex prides itself on is the fact that it is a Mexican company. All three partners reside in Mexico City, where the company is headquartered. Heyman is the lone American employee. (The company's investors are 50 percent American, 35 percent Australian and 15 percent Mexican. Australia's Hoyts Corp. invested US$22 million in November 1996, and J.P. Morgan Capital was one of the first investors to come on board, putting several million dollars into the company back in October 1993.) According to Heyman, "We're a Mexican company with an American flair—and I'm the flair."

Heyman is quick to mention the importance of his two partners. "My two Mexican partners are an incredible advantage in this market. They know how to operate in the culture, because they're from the culture. They can operate with the government, with the real estate community, and with any area that is indigenous to Mexico.

"Cinemex's huge competitive advantage in Mexico is that we are extremely Mexican, but we have the benefit of the U.S. experience."

"We're not here to be the best in Mexico. We're here to set the standard for everything."

Ultimately, the secret of success is creating audience demand, and Cinemex knows how to keep the momentum going. "We'd rather have fewer prints and move them around to all our buildings. The history has always been releasing 60 prints on one picture and then it's dead in one week." Cinemex theatres play approximately 94 percent American films, although "the rest is not Mexican; [the remaining percentage] includes French, Italian and Spanish [films]."

Predicting what will be a hit is an art form unto itself. Converse to American performance, "Dante's Peak" was a huge hit in Mexico City, while "Star Wars" proved to be a disappointment, according to Heyman,. But Heyman says that Mexico City does not generally receive science-fiction well—demonstrating the importance of knowing your market.

Even Heyman, a juggernaut of excitement and business savvy, has been surprised by Cinemex's growth and success in such a short period of time. "I'm quite surprised at our success—that we've achieved so much market share so fast, that we've beat so many other exhibitors to locations. The amount of respect we've achieved from the exhibition community has been really nice."

Although Cinemex is relatively new to the market, Heyman and his partners know that this is not the time to look back and admire their accomplishments. Instead, this is the time to act on their strategies. "The company has a long way to go. We're going to do a lot of great things. We're the second largest chain in the country, in terms of boxoffice, but we have a long way to go. We're far from Mission Accomplished. This is a very aggressive strategy that requires a lot of capital and a lot of work.

"For us, the biggest challenge we have is to maintain ourselves as the best. The next challenge is to continue to get locations, making sure they are supreme locations, and keeping the money flowing. The trick is to minimize what's not going to work and maximize what's going to work."

THE ITALIAN CONNECTION

Cecchi Gori Finds Success On U.S. Soil With Beverly Hills' Fine Arts Theatre by Pat Kramer

Even as European exhibitors continue to joint-venture or compete with American circuits looking to expand overseas, one Continental company is contentedly selling movie tickets in Beverly Hills, Calif. Six years ago, Italy's Cecchi Gori Group bought and completely renovated the Fine Arts Theatre, a historic single-screen moviehouse built in 1936.

Since the 1991 purchase (originally via PentAmerica, the now dissolved American venture between the Cecchi Gori Group and Berlusconi Communications), programming plans have been modified; the intent had been to provide a showcase for European films—especially, if not exclusively, Italian-language fare—for American audiences. "Because [company owner Vittorio] Cecchi Gori owns the largest theatre circuit in Italy, he wanted to have a presence in [U.S.] exhibition, and the hope was to primarily show European films," says Cecchi Gori vice president of production Anna Gross, who is based in West Los Angeles. "Unfortunately, especially being a supplier of European films, we know that market seems to be shrinking. We make less than 30 movies a year in Italy."

The Fine Arts does provide extended runs for Cecchi Gori productions; for example, the company's Academy Award-nominated "Il Postino," distributed by Miramax, ran for 17 weeks there. But, as under previous operator Laemmle Theatres, programming covers the entire art-house genre, both foreign and domestic. That's not surprising, given that Miramax provides a substantial amount of the theatre's bookings.

The first-run theatre is one of only two moviehouses remaining in Beverly Hills. (The other, Laemmle's nearby Music Hall, was recently converted into a triplex and also programs specialized fare.) The Fine Arts additionally serves as a screening facility for the entertainment industry thanks to its state-of-the-art projection and sound equipment, all of which was installed during an eight-month renovation project in 1993 that restored the site to its art-deco glory.

THE ITALIANS ARE COMING: A refurbished Fine Arts opened in December 1993 with "Shadowlands."

For the Italian media magnate, owning a historic theatre—one of the Hollywood community's last single screens—is just another feather in his cap. Although the son of legendary Italian producer Mario Cecchi Gori doesn't plan further stateside expansion, Vittorio is one of Italy's most prominent businessmen. The Senator of Florence and owner of the Fiorentina soccer team, he also runs the continuously expanding Cecchi Gori exhibition circuit, two TV networks, a record label, a host of communications-related industries, and the largest production/distribution company in his homeland. In addition to "Il Postino," his production credits in the 1990s include such notable titles as Gabriele Salvatore's Oscar-winning "Mediterraneo," Gianni Amelio's "Lamerica," Lina Wertmuller's "Ciao Professore!," Guiseppe Tornatore's "The Star Maker" and Roberto Benigni's "Johnny Stecchino."

Over the theatre's lifetime (its doors first opened in 1937), it has passed from Fox Theatres to Mann Theatres to Laemmle, with each organization adding its own touch to the site's look. Designed by renowned theatre architect B. Marcus Pritica (who also designed Hollywood's Pantages Theatre), the moviehouse—then called the Regina—was initially a Fox property. During the 1940s, Fox gave it its first and most pronounced facelift, overseen by designer Charles P. Skouras; it was he who provided the theatre with an art deco flair by installing hammered-metal wall sconces, three ornamental chandeliers, quilted walls with brass buttons, etched metal doors, and a polished-metal concessions stand.

With Skouras' work completed, Fox renamed the theatre the Fine Arts and ran it until 1973, when Mann moved in. In the early '80s, Laemmle took over the theatre, programming specialized films. When Cecchi Gori came on the scene, the theatre was closed for its most recent renovation, which was completed in time for a December 29, 1993 opening with Savoy's "Shadowlands." Gross, who directed the renovation process, used the theatre's glory days as her polestar.

To aid her quest, she hired designer Joe Musil, whose refurbishment efforts for Pacific Theatres at the circuit's El Capitan Theatre in Hollywood and its Crest Theatre in Westwood Village—both of them single-screen halls—had gained well-deserved acclaim. Musil was able to salvage many of the Fine Arts' most intriguing features: He recast the hammered-metal wall sconces and restored the quilted wall coverings and the proscenium, which now displays Skouras' signature 1940s look with swags and tassels.

The brass buttons were removed and made gleaming again; new carpeting was installed; and walls were painted to depict the post-World War II period. The restrooms and the concessions stand were modernized with an art deco motif, the original vintage seats were restored (the theatre now has several fewer rows, allowing for greater legroom throughout the auditorium), armrest cupholders were installed and the marquee was relit to beckon in passersby, letting them know that the "grand old lady" had returned.

As at Musil's redone El Capitan and Crest, a glorious new feature of the vintage look is the Fine Arts' glittering velvet curtain, which greets audiences in a dramatic way. Says Gross, "When people round that bend, they gasp because you don't see theatres like that anymore." All told, the renovations ran into the "high six figures," Gross says.

Along with upgrading its look, Cecchi Gori wanted his theatre to provide outstanding capabilities in sight and sound. "As a production executive, I know how hard you work on a film. I know what you go through—and then it goes into a theatre and you don't even recognize your own film," says Gross, who made sure that the vision here was attained. To revitalize the technical systems at the Fine Arts, Gross hired Tony Francis of Los Angeles-based Theatre Products International. Francis designed a version of the THX sound system, building a wall directly behind the screen and installing loudspeakers in it, and he created a bi-amplified sound system with JBL speakers. The end result is a sound system that is almost identical to what some consider Hollywood's premier screening room, the Samuel Goldwyn Theatre at the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences. Says Francis, "It's a terrific sounding theatre. When Turner Entertainment came out with its restored 'Dr. Zhivago,' it screened at the Fine Arts." Although the original sound installed was analog, the system has since been upgraded with SDDS digital sound.

The projection system is designed to accommodate both commercial films and screenings of dailies for the studios. To allow for flexibility, Francis installed two projectors—one for 70mm films, the other for 35mm—plus a platter system. "The platter works both ways," Francis says, "so that they can use either projector and the platter, or they can do a changeover where they could use both projectors as 35mm." To accommodate the showing of dailies, for which the soundtrack isn't always on the film, a dual dubber (a magnetic sound reproducer) was installed to handle separate picture and track. Both projectors can be interlocked to the dubber to maximize the sound.

With the renovation well underway, Gross began looking for a company to manage the Fine Arts. As part of her deliberations, she traveled to a number of L.A.-area theatres to inspect them for cleanliness as well as to judge the staff's courtesy and knowledgeability. Based on a belief that its management philosophy was similar to hers, Gross chose AMC, which has found great success with its nearby Century City AMC 14 and its seven-screener in Santa Monica.

She had evidence her belief was correct barely a month after the theatre's reopening—specifically, on the morning of January 17, 1994—when a phone call arrived from the Fine Arts manager 40 minutes after the predawn Northridge earthquake. "She had come in the dark during the aftershocks to make sure the theatre was okay," Gross recalls. "That's when I knew we had great management." Although the temblor did inflict a certain amount of damage—some cracking along the roofline and some broken mirrors inside—the theatre was able to re-reopen three weeks later.

Nora Dashwood, AMC's vice president of operations of the West Division, says the Fine Arts has given AMC the opportunity to display its abilities in a new area. The Fine Arts is one of two single-screeners (the other is in San Jose) that AMC manages, an interesting sideline for the company commonly credited with giving birth to the contemporary multiplex. "What attracted AMC to the job," Dashwood says, "was the phenomenal job [Cecchi Gori] did with the theatre. It's an absolute jewel, and customers are very pleased to have seen it renovated back to—even better than—its former glory. Being in Beverly Hills, where the film community is, the producers and stars, we felt it would give AMC a chance to showcase our operational expertise, as well as to be able to run a beautiful theatre."

Now in its fourth year run under the Cecchi Gori flag, the Fine Arts provides a quality of viewing a cut above some local theatres—and certainly several cuts above many theatres that make their living on foreign films. As Gross puts it, "It's a place for those who want to enjoy foreign films in a theatre that doesn't have sticky floors." Indeed, keeping the theatre clean is one of the priorities at the Fine Arts; another is serving high-quality beverages and food. At the concessions counter, patrons can choose from the likes of cappuccino, espresso, fresh-baked pretzels, Snapple drinks, and dried fruits, in addition to the customary popcorn and soft drinks. As with all the features at the Fine Arts, everything is artfully displayed on polished counters. And, with a theatre capacity that tops out at 500, the lines are never very long.

With its subtitled films, which show more frequently at the Fine Arts than in mainstream houses, the theatre sees a higher percentage of deaf viewers. To expand the viewing opportunities for that audience segment, the Fine Arts made an agreement with the Tripod School for the Deaf and the Deaf Entertainment Foundation (DEF) and is showing English-language films for the hearing impaired. The program launched in summer 1995 with a special screening of Warner Bros.' "The Bridges of Madison County," complete with open-captioned subtitles and special captioning indicating musical song lyrics and sound effects. Holding more of such screenings for the deaf, Gross says, remains a key goal.

Then called the Regina, the theatre drew a crowd with a Lugosi/Karloff scarefest in 1942.

Whether it's providing a more comfortable sanctuary for art-house lovers and its many celebrity patrons, or whether it's serving as one of the most "authentic" old theatres now operating with modern sight and sound quality, the Fine Arts provides new-Hollywood fare in an early-Hollywood setting. It also represents a coming-together of two cultures, with Italian owner Cecchi Gori providing the expertise in foreign films, and AMC, one of America's top circuits, providing the management. Say AMC's Dashwood, "It's a bit of a throwback to the past, restoring some of Hollywood's glory. There are not a lot of theatres in L.A., where Hollywood started. Most of the old beautiful single screens have gone by the wayside. I think the theatre is appreciated for that."

Circle Surround™

The patented new DSP matrix system that produces 6 separate channels of audio from optical stereo or SR soundtracks. Licensed exclusively by SMART.

The new MOD VI Cinema Stereo Processor breaks the price barrier for feature/price ratio. Features you cannot get in any other product, at any price!

- Circle Surround matrix for 6 real channels on optical soundtracks. Produces split surround from regular 4 channel optical tracks.
- New Slimline design. Only 3 ½" rack space.
- Stereo noise reduction for both stereo optical and SR soundtracks is standard. No expensive option cards to buy.
- Full one Octave house equalizers on Left, Center, Right, Left Surround and Right Surround channels.
- Plug-in connector on back for DTS or DA-20 Digital Player. Ready for digital sound now or in the future.
- SRS sound enhancement is now a standard feature. For the first time SRS may be used for analog and digital soundtracks. May be turned on or off from front panel or by automation for feature films.
- Full bypass for emergency operation.
- Digital DSP adjustable time delay up to 110 mS for large auditoriums.
- Fold-forward front panel for easy access and servicing.
- Built-in pink noise generator.
- Output mute to kill turn-on pops.
- Universal 120-240 VAC operation.
- 6-channel, 4-channel or Front-Surround operation by moving jumpers. DSP matrix for all channels or F/S DSP with split surrounds
- No re-EQ required if you change main board.

SRS 3-D Sound Enhancement

The patented system that adds a full, panoramic sound field to any soundtrack.

The SRS feature may be activated from the front control panel for analog and digital soundtracks.

The lowest cost cinema stereo processor in the industry! 40% lower than the CP-45 which has only a fraction of these features.

KNOCKIN' ON THE BOXOFFICE DOOR

A German-made blockbuster may serve as a blueprint for the European production and exhibition

by PKay Krieg

"You've never seen the ocean? Don't you know what happens when you get to heaven? In heaven, all they talk about is the ocean. How gorgeously beautiful it is. And all the sunsets that they saw. How you could feel the sun lose its strength. And how the cool water splashed forward and the only fire left was the fire in their souls. And you? You can't say a thing, because you've never been there. Up there, you'll be nothing but a f----d up outsider."
—from "Knockin' on Heaven's Door"

The German film industry is celebrating its strongest period since the 1950s, when domestically-made German product dominated theatre screens. In first-quarter 1997, German features accounted for 37 percent of the national boxoffice. More than 11.6 million filmgoers viewed German features at moviehouses. In comparison, American films counted 19.3 million admissions in the same period. This is astounding, considering the very large amount of American film being shown on German screens. During 1997's first three months, 3,091 prints of locally-made films were delivered to German theatres—a third more than during an entire year just half a decade ago.

"We want to concentrate on producing German films in Germany for the German public." That was how Wolfgang Braun, vice president of Buena Vista International Germany, summed up his company's domestic business strategy two years ago at the Buena Vista International trade fair. And he wasted no time in putting this credo into action. Buena Vista Germany's first German production, "Knockin' on Heaven's Door," a dramedy in road-movie style, is already setting industry standards on how German product will be viewed internationally and how it will be produced in the years to come. Among other things, the Buena Vista production shows how capital from a U.S.-based company can be used to reinvigorate a European market, as opposed to siphoning local resources, which divisions of Hollywood studios are occasionally accused of doing.

DOORWAY: The story of two men who want to reach the sea, "Knockin' on Heaven's Door" has opened new vistas for German film.

Buena Vista Germany risked plunging into new territory by working with a dynamic young German production company called Mr. Brown Entertainment. The result of this cooperative effort is a road movie about two terminally ill men, Martin and Rudi, who meet in the hospital. After realizing that one of them has never seen the ocean, they steal a car, planning on driving north to the sea before one of them dies. It turns out that the car belongs to Frankie Boy, whose hitmen, Henk and Abdul, were supposed to transport it (and the million German marks in the trunk) to Frankie's boss, Curtiz. Now millionaires, Rudi and Martin go on shopping sprees, order room service in the best hotels, and set about making their foremost wishes come true, determined to get to the ocean before fate overtakes them.

"Knockin' on Heaven's Door" was an instant commercial smash for Buena Vista. Within just eight weeks it garnered the coveted Golden Screen Award (Goldene Leinwand) for more than three million admissions sold (a feat that typically takes up to 18 months in release). The film could be seen in almost every theatre complex in Germany during February and March 1997, and it received two prestigious German Film Award nominations: for Best Film and Best Supporting Actor. Buena Vista Germany and Mr. Brown Entertainment touched the pulse of the nation with their first try, which makes the details of this intriguing partnership worth noting as a possible production model for the shape of German things to come.

It all began rather harmlessly two years ago in a bookstore in Cologne. There, Thomas Jahn bumped into Til Schweiger. Schweiger at that time was regarded as a major up-and-coming star in Germany. (He's since gained that reputation stateside, having become hot in Hollywood.) He was basking in the success of "Der Bewegte Mann" ("Maybe, Maybe Not"), another huge domestic hit, which was released on October 13, 1994. Produced by Bernd Eichinger (head of Constantin Film), "Maybe, Maybe Not" is currently the second most popular German film of the past 16 years, having earned the Golden Screen with Star award (a distinction rarely achieved) for amassing more than six million domestic admissions (to be exact, "Maybe, Maybe Not" pulled in 6,510,213 moviegoers during its first run).

Response No. 289

That hit catapulted Schweiger into the highest echelons of the country's talent. For Thomas Jahn, meeting Schweiger was therefore a moment of destiny. Jahn is a self-described movie freak: "When I was 12 or so, all I did was go to the movies," he says, "or watch them on TV. I ingested everything I could get my hands on—classics from Howard Hawks or John Ford, American cult movies like 'Midnight Run,' action flicks, just about everything."

A CO-VENTURE ADVENTURE: Wolfgang Braun of BVI Germany (l.) says the Disney subsidiary took a chance on first-time director Thomas Jahn (r.) because the studio wanted "to offer the German audience a new domestic type of film."

The reference to "Midnight Run"—another odd-couple road movie—is no coincidence. In Jahn's film, "Knockin' on Heaven's Door," Schweiger's character is named Martin Brest, after "Midnight Run's" U.S. director. His partner's character is named after Rudolph Wurlitzer, the screenwriter for Sam Peckinpah's cult western "Pat Garrett and Billy the Kid." And it's the Bob Dylan tune used as the musical motif in "Pat Garrett" that eventually gave Jahn's breakthrough feature its title: "Knockin' on Heaven's Door."

So when Jahn, who was moonlighting at that time as a taxi driver, saw Schweiger leafing through film books, he had to go up and talk with him. They discussed "Der bewegte Mann," Schweiger's growing interest in creating and producing his own films, and Jahn's stash of unrealized screenplays sitting in his closet. One thing led to another, and within a week of this initial meeting Schweiger's mailbox was busting at the seams: Jahn had sent him a potpourri of possible film ideas. In that stack of scripts was a first draft of "Knockin' on Heaven's Door."

"What bothers me is that death is such an uncomfortable way to live."
—from "Knockin' on Heaven's Door"

Schweiger was automatically drawn to the story and knew he wanted to film it. He and Jahn worked on the script for about

GERMAN PRODUCTION'S SECOND COMING

If current trends continue, 1997 should be a big year for German-produced cinema at the German boxoffice. In addition to the numerous smaller domestic films which will be in play, here are a few of the higher-profile features that are either currently in the editing room or else in production for prospective release this year (all release dates are tentative):

● Buena Vista International Germany is the number one major involved in domestic production, with a handful of German co-productions, including:
"Bandits" is a musical comedy about an all-girl prison band from Katja von Garnier starring Katja Riemann, Nicolette Krebitz, Jasmin Tabatabai and Hannes Jaen-nicke. (German release date: July 3);
"Hunger: To Yearn for Love," a dramatic love story about the effects that bulimia can have on one's life, is Dana Vavrova's directorial debut and stars Catherine Flemming, Kai Wiesinger and Christiane Horbiger. The film is produced together with Perathon Film, the production company of German filmmaker Joseph Vilsmaier (Vavrova's husband). (Sept. 4);
"2 Frauen, 2 Manner" ("Two Women, Two Men"), a comedy about infidelity by Vivian Naefe from Olga Film, stars Heino Firch, Aglaia Szyszkowitz and Gedeon Burkhard. (Oct. 16);
"Widows" stars Uwe Ochsenknecht, Heino Firch, Huub Stapel, Thomas Heinze and Eva Mattes. Sherry Hormann is at the helm. (Early 1998).

● Bernd Eichinger's Constantin Film is another company hard at work on delivering high-quality German product. Its slate includes:
"Die 3 Madels von der Tankstelle" ("Three Girls at the Gas Station") is a comedy starring Wigald Boning, Axel Milberg and Franka Potente from Peter Brinkmann. Boning is the star of Germany's answer to "Saturday Night Live"; this film marks his feature debut. (June 12).
"Prince Valiant," a fantasy-adventure film based on the comic series, marks another international production for Constantin (following "Smilla's Sense of Snow"). Anthony Hickox directs an international cast including Stephen Moyer, Katherine Heigl, Edward Fox, Ron Perlman, Udo Kier and Thomas Kretschmann. The film will be shot in English. (July 3).

● Concorde-Castle Rock/Turner is also entering the ring and will be promoting Paul Harather's newest release, a holiday comedy entitled "Weihnachtsfieber" ("Christmas Fever"). (Nov. 13).

● Warner Bros. Germany has quite a few projects in the development and discussion stage. Two that will definitely be released this year are:
"Die Furchtlosen Vier" ("The Fearless Four") is an animation comedy based on the classic fairy tale about the Bremer Town Musicians. Currently, it is set to open just before the fall school vacations on Oct. 2.
"Das Trio" ("The Three") is a crime drama starring Christian Redl and Felix Eisner from Hermine Hundgeburth. This debut film from Next Film in Hamburg boasts a five million mark budget and is slated for release on Dec. 4.—PKay Krieg a year until they had the story honed. After investing so much in their endeavor, Schweiger was afraid of losing creative control over the project. Thus, in the spring of 1996, he formed Mr. Brown Entertainment (a name taken from Quentin Tarantino's "Reservoir Dogs") together with Thomas Zickler, an independent short film and commercial producer, and with Andre Hennicke, a screenwriter and actor.

ON THE ROAD: Jan Josef Liefers and Til Schweiger are the terminally ill adventurers in "Knockin' on Heaven's Door."

Mr. Brown immediately began developing its first feature, and a positive buzz echoed through the German industry. The fact that Germany's answer to Brad Pitt was personally involved in the creative and financial process sparked interest at the offices of domestic distribution. Buena Vista Germany was one of the first local distributors to make inquiries. Schweiger didn't trust the postal service to make the sale. "I just didn't want to send them a script," he explains. "I wanted the chance to personally introduce the film and all the ideas behind it."

A mutual friend introduced Schweiger to Christoph Ott, executive director of distribution at Buena Vista Germany. "We didn't realize that this meeting would prove to be so important," Schweiger reflects. "After this initial meeting, we met for another two or three hours. I read him through the entire film and even played out some of the scenes."

Schweiger's performance must have been very convincing. Buena Vista Germany not only became co-producer of "Knockin' on Heaven's Door," it also distributed the film in German-speaking territories (Germany, Austria and Switzerland). By teaming with Buena Vista International, "Knockin' on Heaven's Door" profited from high-quality PR attuned to the likes and dislikes of the German public. The entire BVI marketing department knew exactly how to position the film with audiences and exhibitors alike.

"A crucial factor in our decision to become involved in the project was Til Schweiger's enthusiastic dedication to it," says BVI's Braun. "After studying the material, we knew it would make a first-class film. But we decided to go about the production our way. Of course, we could have hired a well-known TV director to take the helm. But then the film would have had that certain old-fashioned look. We wanted to offer the German audience a new domestic type of film, and Schweiger's enthusiasm and professional way of doing business made that decision even easier."

"When I found out that the film was really greenlighted, I was ecstatic," Jahn recalls. "But when Til kept talking and told me that I was going to direct it, well, that was too much." Jahn could hardly believe that a major studio would trust a no-name with such a project. "Up till then I had made only a few Super-8 and video films. I never dreamed anyone would give someone like myself the reins of a million mark film project." This faith in his capabilities proved to be that extra incentive Jahn needed. "Til and all the others had so much trust in me. I didn't want to let them down and did all I could to make [the film] a success."

Once the crew was set, it was time to focus on the talent in front of the camera. Not only the main characters but the cameo appearances read like a who's who of young German and European cinema. Jan Josef Liefers took the second main role of the melancholic Rudi Wurlitzer against Schweiger's more dynamic and extroverted main character. The film received a touch of Hollywood by enlisting Rutger Hauer to play the role of Curtiz, the mini Mafia boss in charge of the whole operation. And Holland's best known export, Huub Stapel, took the role of Frankie Boy.

The secret stars of the film, though, are Henk and Abdul—two hitmen with very limited intelligence. Moritz Bleibtreu received a German Film Award nomination for his portrayal of Abdul, and the best-known star in Luxembourg, Thierry van Werveke, took the role of Henk. The scenes with those two characters were so popular that project talks are currently underway to develop a spin-off sequel: "Henk & Abdul: The Boys are Back in Town."

Schweiger was even able to convince his mentor Bernd Eichinger, the innovator of modern German film production, to take a small cameo role—no easy task. Eichinger judges himself a miserable actor, and considers his forte to be behind-the-scenes work. "I didn't let loose until he said yes," Schweiger says. The cameo appearance—shot with another German household name, Hannes Jaennicke—comes right before the end credits and was an immediate hit with the audience.

"Knockin' on Heaven's Door" opened in Germany on February 20 of this year and promptly became the number one movie in the nation, a status it maintained the following weekend. It went on to become the second most popular German film of the first quarter of 1997. The arrival of "Das kleine Arschloch" ("The Little Bastard"), a domestic adult animation comedy, pushed "Knockin'" to number two on its third weekend.

On the live-action side, however, not even Buena Vista's own high-powered U.S.-produced competition could hurt Jahn's debut film. "101 Dalmatians" opened against "Das kleine Arschloch" and landed at number three on its first weekend, behind those two German productions.

"Good work, Keller. Thinking always helps!"

—from "Knockin' on Heaven's Door"

Both "Knockin'" and the social satire "Rossini" (another Eichinger production, which has also received the Golden Screen Award and is the top-grossing domestic release of this year) prove that the German and European publics are ready to embrace well-made domestic fare. And there is no shortage of creative talent ready to follow in Schweiger's footsteps, either in front of the camera or behind the scenes [see sidebar, p.46]. Not only Buena Vista but also other majors and domestic distributors are eager to help finance and distribute German film.

The success of this latest slew of German product has proven to even the toughest naysayers that there is indeed a financial future for domestic product. "Knockin' on Heaven's Door" offers vindication for the commercial style of moviemaking as it applies in Germany, inasmuch as it is a departure from the artistic and cultural German films of the 1960s and '70s, which focused on high-brow, sometimes grim subjects appealing primarily to specialized audiences. Where those esoteric efforts always seemed to project a "message," "Knockin' on Heaven's Door" succeeds first and foremost as entertainment.

Undeniably, serious and "art" films are still important and will continue to fill a global niche. But from a purely pragmatic standpoint they have limited commercial appeal. And what's wrong with just wanting to be entertained? Apparently nothing, as "Knockin' on Heaven's Door" demonstrates. It is proving to the German film industry that domestically created "entertainment" can indeed be popular and acceptable—not to mention profitable.

"Our film is one giant pioneering effort and we are proud of it," sums up producer/actor/screenwriter and risk taker Schweiger. "It was done in true team spirit." A team that was courageous and daring enough to go where not many German films have gone before—and, quite possibly, to take the rest of the German film industry along with it: straight into boxoffice heaven.

GIANTS OF EUROPEAN EXHIBITION

A Directory of 20 Top European Circuits

Here it is—a compilation of 20 of Europe's top exhibition circuits and supporting trade organizations. Although some companies didn't respond to multiple faxes and phone calls (you know who you are), we believe this to be the most useful directory of its type. Enjoy! And for those European circuits that didn't make the list—there's always next year. Call, fax or e-mail us with your comments or corrections.

French film luminaries on the uneasy truce between France and the U.S. by Karen Achenbach

More than 102 years ago, the United States and France began separate but equal paths in the creation of motion pictures. Today they remain cinema equals, though in very different ways. The U.S. increasingly dominates the global market (most commonly with technically brilliant, language-recessive action spectacles) to such an extent that film production in many countries is disappearing. But France's use of legislation to keep its film culture healthy makes the French film industry a unique example of the pros and cons of a protectionist approach to the film marketplace.

As far back in cinema history as the late 1950s, Andre Malraux, the first French minister of culture, established the now famous advance on receipts ("Avance sur recettes"), a tax on movie tickets to help finance independent films, administered by the Centre National de la Cinematographie (CNC). The bigger the boxoffice, the more funds there are to distribute back to the filmmakers. Considering that, in France, boxoffice is measured by admissions (by the number of people who come, rather than the dollars they hold), this assigns a deep and (typically French) nationalistic significance to overall attendance. And attendance has been rising. According to Laurent Danielou, of the French Consulate in Los Angeles, in 1996 moviegoing was up from each of the past three years: 140 million admissions in 1996, 125 million admissions in 1993.

"Protectionism" and "subsidy" are somewhat dirty words to U.S. producers, but it's hard to deny the impact of these French measures. As a result of all these steps, France is holding its own in the face of a global system that threatens to over-simplify the market, and France remains the European market where North American cinema gathers the smallest market share. It was also the French who spearheaded an action to exclude cinema (culture) from the GATT (General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade) treaty, fearing in part that, under the general agreement, France's elaborate system of subsidies would be dismantled.

GOING WITH THE FLOW: Alice Houri as Nenette in Claire Denis' "Nenette and Boni."

Stateside, there are problems for French product. Of the 500 or so movies released in North America last year, only 20 were French. Motivated by the decreasing U.S. market for French films, a Franco-American cultural fund was created from blank videocassette tax monies to support the promotion of French films in the United States. To this end, a stellar panel of representatives from the French industry recently came to America to plead the French case. The seriousness with which the French view the situation is apparent in that the delegation included two of the most internationally successful French directors, both of whom brought prints of their latest films: Claude Lelouch ("A Man and A Woman," "Bolero," "Les Miserables"), whose most recent effort is entitled "Men, Women: User's Manual," and Bertrand Tavernier ("Round Midnight," " A Sunday in the Country"), whose "Captain Conan" offered a portrait of a sub-group of warriors within an army.

Both of these veteran filmmakers agree the state of the French film industry is healthy, yet challenged. "For a hundred years French cinema has been in crisis," says Lelouch. "But it is easier nonetheless to make a film in France than in most other countries. The authorities like cinema. There are internal rules which allow us to use money that is earned by the cinema. All the successes of films play a part in the production of film. So I think the French cinema is very resilient—in a permanent state of crisis, but it can defend itself."

For Tavernier, alive means aware. "Today, the French cinema is very much alive, with a lot of ideas. One proof of this life is that 66 French directors decided to fight a shameful French law against immigration. More than 100,000 people were in the street [to protest the law]. And it was the young [generation] of film directors who started this."

One of the more successful young producers, Georges Benayoun ("Wild Reeds, "Mina Tannenbaum" and the current U.S. release "Irma Vep," out via Zeitgeist), believes things are looking better and better, particularly on France's domestic side. "Today, the French cinema is very alive. Six years ago we got 29 percent of the share of the market, and now it's around 38 percent. You have to understand that France is the only country [in Europe] with a national market like that. Even in the United Kingdom, British films have only seven percent or eight percent of the market."

Producer Benayoun has several recent titles that he is currently shopping in the international market: "The Apartment," a slick exercise in architecture and cinematography by first-timer Gilles Mimouni; and "Nenette and Boni", a stunningly intimate film by Claire Denis ("Chocolat," "I Can't Sleep").

NEW DIRECTIONS: "Captain Conan" director Bertrand Tavernier feels French films might be too complex for U.S. audiences.

Recent events in Benayoun's career prove that Hollywood and French talent are not mutually exclusive concepts. Earlier this year, "The Apartment" screened at Park City's Sundance Film Festival. Soon after, Benayoun and Mimouni were both signed by CAA; U.S. distribution for "The Apartment" and a possible remake are in the works. Meanwhile, "Nenette and Boni" has been picked up by San Francisco-based Strand Releasing for a 1997 release in the States.

Benayoun asserts that the French are now competing for market shares and producing many different types of films, even science fiction (like "The Fifth Element," an $80+ million, French-financed extravaganza from the "Gallic Spielberg," Luc Besson). Among young filmmakers, it appears that ultra-realism is popular, as in debut filmmaker Sandrine Veysset's "Will It Snow for Christmas." As for trends, Benayoun believes the major trend in French cinema is toward more audience-friendly, less specialized fare. "The only trend I see is [that] the writer and the director are more willing to have success. They want the audiences now, and they are talking about how to attract the audience and yet not lose their authenticity."

And attract an audience they must, not only abroad but at home. Despite pro-French cinema initiatives, Hollywood has an overwhelming presence on French screens. "You have to understand that 10 years ago we received about 80 or 90 American films," explains Benayoun. "This year, for instance, there are 160. There are more American films, they stay less time on the screen, and it's always new films."

The French wariness of an unbridled free-market approach to cinema is also affecting French exhibition. Multiplexes, new to France, are encountering legislation to limit their growth, in order to protect the art-house cinemas of the cities and to defend against the practice of using many screens for few movies. Despite the success his own films have had in the U.S., Tavernier articulates the fear many French film professionals feel about changing France's exhibition infrastructure. "In Germany," he claims, "where the number of screens devoted to the American cinema is much larger than in France, they release less [domestic product]." [For a counter opinion, see our article on the German market, p. 44.]

"Nenette and Boni" director Denis agrees. "American cinema is dear to every single French director. But we don't like the American emphasis on economics, and we don't like the way that emphasis is taking hold in world cinema. We consider cinema not only merchandise but also art."

As to breaking into the U.S. market, "maybe we have to make better movies," asserts Mimouni. But Mimouni also turns the "protectionist" argument on its head, saying, "In America, your cinema is incredibly protected. It's quite impossible for a foreign movie to be released, and if it is released it's a very small release."

Demonstrably, the U.S. market for foreign product is still shrinking. In 1970 there were 52 French movies distributed stateside, while in 1990 there were only 25. Denis, who had stateside success with her 1988 film "Chocolat," describes the difference in her past and current experiences. "My experience here with 'Chocolat' was great because I had a great distributor—Orion before it became Sony Classics—and the film really met the audience. [Getting] 'Nenette and Boni' a U.S. release was much more difficult, but now I have a good distributor [Strand Releasing] though the deal is modest."

Lelouch has had American distribution for only 10 of his 35 films in the 40 years of his career. At press time, his latest, "Men, Women: User's Manual" was being considered for release by the specialty arm of a major studio. "The companies that could distribute our films, that is to say the majors, are not interested in our films," says Lelouch. "So we have to absolutely encourage the small distributors. The only thing that really can make a success of a French film here now is word of mouth."

Word of mouth takes time, and there is so much product out there that the market has become very swift and often very deadly. Paradoxically, the rise of American independent film, as assisted by the rise of Disney-owned Miramax, has hurt foreign product by claiming for American-made titles a greater portion of the boxoffice shared by independent and foreign titles. Miramax also dominates many of the art-houses, leaving smaller distributors without screens.

According to Jon Gerrins, co-president of Strand Releasing, Strand recoups its investment on English-language titles with video and cable sales, "and that's where our foreign-language films are having a problem. HBO won't buy foreign-language films [unless they are Academy Award winners], and I can't get the same amount of dollars for these pictures as I can get for an average English-language picture that can play on a Saturday night."

Subtitles are accused of ruining the market for foreign-language product. Americans seem unwilling to read language onscreen, whereas in Europe people not only read but speak several languages, and subtitling is the norm. But "the problem is more than just the subtitles," says Tavernier. "The problem for French films in the U.S. is that they do not bring easy answers. There is not an easy way out. In a country where there is a lot of unemployment, where there are political problems, and where the people feel insecure, where there is a lot of fear, films that are easy to watch are popular. They bring easy answers. You have a problem with the Middle East, you send Schwarzenegger. No more problems. The kids go and see those films. French films are not built that way."

The French will continue trying to find an audience in the U.S. "America is the mecca of film, so you always feel very good when you have your film seen here," Benayoun confirms. The hope for the future "depends on the American audience," asserts Lelouch. "I am optimistic because it is my nature. If I wasn't optimistic I wouldn't try to make my 36th film. And therefore if my films are not distributed immediately they will be distributed another day. They are immortal. And they'll wait for their audience to be ready for them."

MULTIPLEX MAVEN

Founder of Decatron and Kinepolis and father of the European multiplex, Albert Bert is Cinema Expo's Exhibitor of the Year

by Pat Kramer

Albert Bert, founder of the Belgium-based Decatron N.V. and co-founder of its sister company, the Kinepolis Group, is Cinema Expo's Exhibitor of the Year. Bert's exhibition circuit is Belgium's largest, and it's making inroads into the Dutch and French markets due to the company's unique qualifications in building multiplexes.

Widely regarded as the man who launched Europe's multiplex boom in the 1980s, Bert's companies now operate 11 multiplexes (including two in France) with 100 screens. Born into a family whose heritage was exhibition, Bert followed the example of his grandfather, Charles Bert, a forerunner in early exhibition. The elder Bert established Harelbeke's first cinema in 1927, running silents at the Hotel de Flandres, while Albert's father, Alfred, debuted Harelbeke's Theatre Majestic in 1941.

Starting out as a ticket seller, Albert later became involved in the single-screen theatre's renovation into a twin-screen cinema, providing Belgium with its first multiplex. Joining forces with his sister-in-law, Rose Claeys, Bert built a three-screen theatre called Trioscoop in 1972 as a sort of test case to see if attendance would increase when a greater choice of films was provided. Located in Hasselt, a small provincial town with only two screens at the time, Trioscoop was a perfect place to begin proving this theory. The success of Trioscoop quickly demonstrated that multi-screen cinemas were the way to go in Belgium. Bert later added four more screens to the theatre.

However, as Bert recalls, other exhibitors were not quite ready to accept the concept back then. "When my family first started multiplexing in Belgium, 25 to 30 years ago, attendance was down very low. Most of my colleagues thought, 'Yes, he's lucky. Each time it's a bulls-eye, but it will not continue.'"

Pentascoop, a five-screen cinema, followed in 1975 in Kortrijk. In 1981, the 12-screen Decascoop was built in Ghent. Setting a new standard for the whole of Europe, Decascoop's dozen halls and stadium seating for 3,500 made it one of the first modern multiplexes. "That was the first very big multiplex," Bert recollects. "It had 12 screens, but only one projection booth!"

Having established expertise in multiplexes, Bert in 1987 founded Decatron, owned by the Bert family. The Kinepolis Group, a partnership between Bert and Claeys, was inaugurated the following year with the opening in Brussels in 1988 of Kinepolis, then the world's largest multiplex. With Kinepolis, featuring 24 screens plus an IMAX theatre, Bert continued to set the trend for European exhibition.

Since that time, the Kinepolis Group has added three additional multiplexes. The 24-screen, 8,500-seat Metropolis is in Antwerp, and there are two multiplexes in France: Kinepolis's 14-screen complex at St. Julien-les-Metz and the 23-screen Le Chateau du Cinema at Lomme (Lille). This September, another multiplex will open in Belgium, a 10-screen complex in Kortrijk.

With the Belgian exhibition market now reaching its saturation point, Bert says plans are to expand into new markets. One such venture includes the freshly inked partnership between Decatron managing director Joost Bert (Bert's eldest son) and A.J. Weststrate of Holland's Cinema Groep for an eight-screen multiplex in Vlissingen (see our report in the May 1997 issue). This partnership is expected to yield at least 10 exhibition outlets in the Netherlands over the next few years.

Given such burgeoning growth, Bert relies on sons Joost, Koen, Geert and Peter to help with management and planning. (There are also 13 grandchildren to carry on the family tradition.) Although he acknowledges his role in bringing about European multiplexing, he says there are always new challenges in exhibition. "I am always busy. I just received a call from my son, Joost, who has been [in France] in Nancy to talk with city authorities. Yesterday, he was in Reims, about 200 kilometers from here. In every city in which we go, we have competition. We're in competition with French companies that started five or six years ago in multiplexing. They don't have the same experience as us, but I still have to plead for my project."

Commenting on his Exhibitor of the Year award, Bert comments wryly, "It's better than the Lifetime Achievement Award. I am only 69 years old—I'm not done yet!" Saying he's inspired by his father and grandfather in heaven, Bert continues to greet the new challenges with the same perseverance and vision that has won him acclaim for nearly three decades in exhibition.

MULTI-MEDIA MAN

Fox International president Jim Gianopulos, a seasoned entertainment veteran, is Cinema Expo's Distributor of the Year

by Pat Kramer

Since becoming president of Twentieth Century Fox International, Jim Gianopulos has seen his company's boxoffice tallies double each year. Having foreign rights to the likes of the Oscar-winning "Braveheart" (earning more than $140 million overseas), "Independence Day" (more than $500 million) and the redone "Star Wars" trilogy (expected to generate $250 million) didn't hurt, but he credits his staff—"a tightly knit team, dedicated to making the most of all our films in the international marketplace while working closely with our exhibition partners to do so"—for much of the success.

A 15-year veteran of international distribution, Gianopulos has a strong background in emerging entertainment technologies (video, pay TV and satellite)—experience that has helped him better understand the exhibition marketplace, he says. As senior vice president of business affairs/international for RCA/Columbia Pictures International Video from 1982 to 1986, Gianopulos worked to establish the company's worldwide video operations. He moved to a similar slot at Paramount Pictures in 1986, building the studio's overseas video and pay TV businesses. "Those were great times and times of rapid growth and excitement," he recalls. "Being a part of it was very gratifying and rewarding." During a nine-month stint as executive vice president, international at Carolco Pictures, Gianopulos boosted revenues handling films like "Terminator 2," "Cliffhanger" and "Basic Instinct."

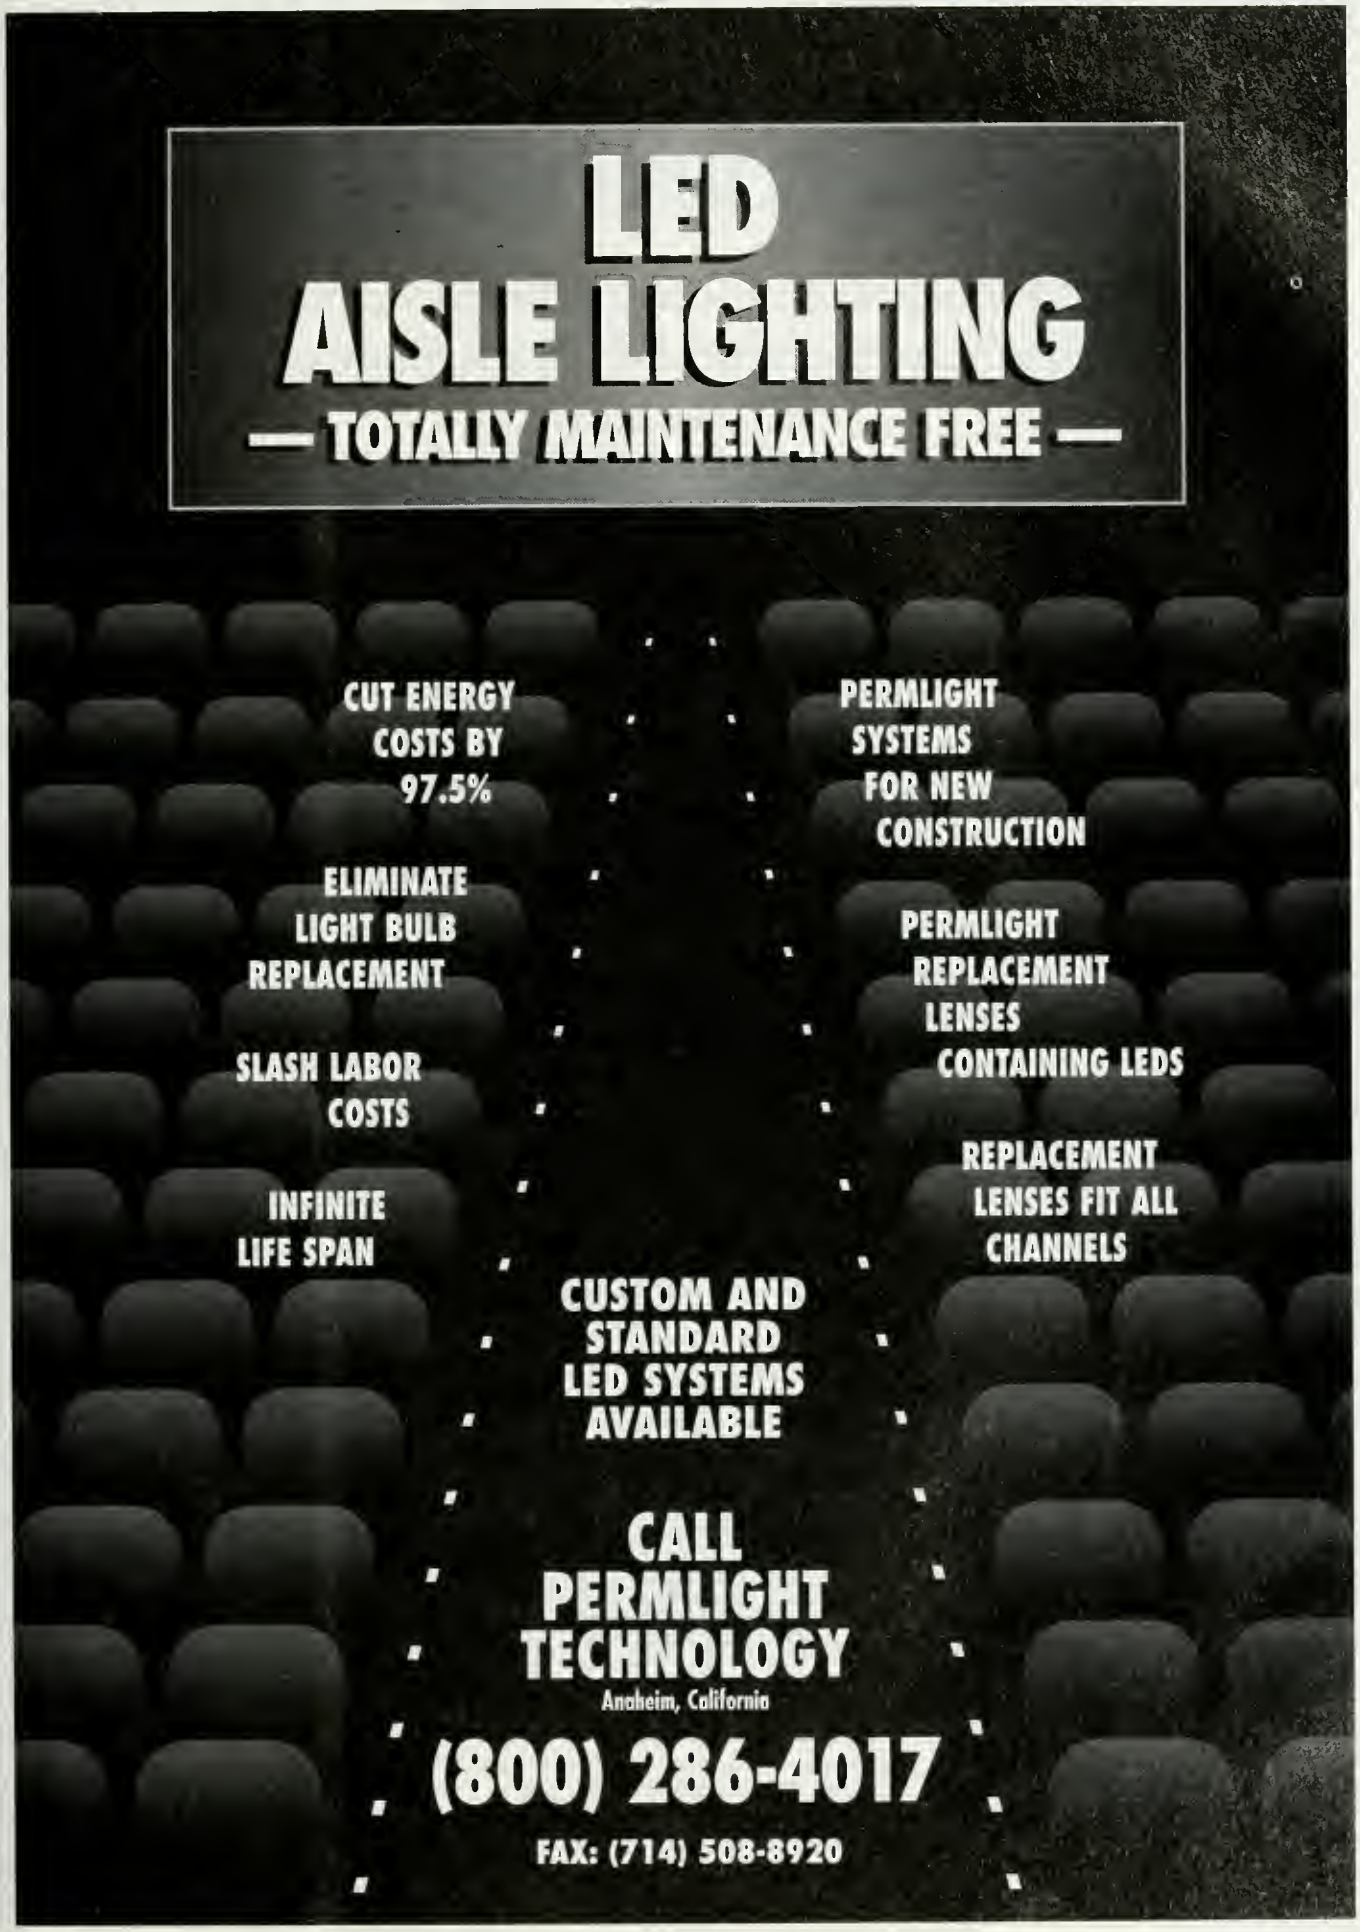
He joined Fox in 1992 as president of international and pay TV and took his current post in 1994. Gianopulos has spearheaded the development of the studio's regional offices in Europe, Latin America and Asia. He's also responsible for overseeing foreign marketing and distribution for all of Fox's theatrical releases and overseas acquisitions.

"It's interesting to find myself in the theatrical side of the business," he says, "because I spent so much of my career in video, pay TV and satellite distribution. But what I learned in this process is that, ultimately, the beginning of the lifepsan of any film—and the most innovative point in its existence—is at its initiation, its first release in theatres."

BOXOFFICE

SPECIAL REPORT:

CINEMA EXPO 1997



Rather than thinking of alternatives like pay TV and video as threats, Gianopulos believes each medium has its place. "It's not about trying to diminish those businesses," he says, "It's quite the opposite. Ultimately, a studio succeeds because it lives in harmony with the various media and distribution windows. It's not about trying to pretend TV or video will go away. It's about heightening the experience and the value perceived and the importance of the media we're in."

Comparing the 1980s trend toward home video to that of consumer response to color TV and even radio at their inceptions, Gianopulos says, "What we learn from all these cycles of new media is that, ultimately, people's desire to see film increases overall. And they realize that the most exciting and newest place to see films is at a theatre on a big screen."

Gianopulos has a bullish outlook for foreign returns. "If you look at East Germany, there's been a very severe economic recession—and yet attendance is up almost 20 percent, largely due to the improvements of the cinema infrastructure." Similar scenarios are occurring in Hungary, Poland and the Czech Republic, where revenues are hitting records as screens are improved, and in Spain and Germany, where rapid screen growth has led to admissions gains despite recessionary conditions. "With Greece, Italy and Portugal's cinema expansion," he says, "the potential in Europe and the international marketplace is tremendous."

Another plus is the longer playing season. "Typically, summer has not been the most active cinemagoing season. But then you look at a place like Germany, where admissions last year were up 60 percent, in part due to the generic campaign we did. In Italy, the expansion of the season into May and an earlier opening in August and September are leading to increased revenues. I think people are finding that the better the theatres, the better the experience, the more likely they are to go—and go more often during the entire year, as opposed to just at Christmas in years past."

Acknowledging his Cinema Expo Distributor of the Year award, Gianopulos says, "It's an honor to win the award, but it's really an award that reflects the enormous success that Fox International has had, particularly in the past year, and in rebuilding an organization over the past couple of years. And, while I get to make the speeches, that success belongs to a team of almost 500 people spread across the world. And I shared with them their hard work and dedication that made it possible."

CELSMANSHIP

Disney Animation president Peter Schneider is honored with Cinema Expo's International Creative Achievement Award

by Pat Kramer

Since Peter Schneider joined Disney 12 years ago, the company has achieved phenomenal commercial and artistic success with such animated fare as "The Lion King," "Toy Story," "Beauty and the Beast," "Aladdin" and "The Little Mermaid." Under the generalship of Schneider and Disney Co. vice chairman Roy Disney, the studio has continued its long distinction of being the world's animation leader. It's deserved, then, that Schneider—president of Walt Disney Feature Animation and Walt Disney Theatrical Productions—is this year's recipient of Cinema Expo's International Creative Achievement Award.

Schneider insists that the glory is not all his. "This award is not for me, per se," he says, "but is symbolic of [the work] that both Roy Disney and I have overseen." Schneider says he's less excited about his name being on the award than by the fact that animation is finally being honored globally. "I'm thrilled for the artists being recognized by the international community. I feel animation is a very collective art form in many, many ways. These artists are truly spectacular in what they've done. I'm proud of all of them."

Under Schneider's leadership, the animation division has grown tenfold in size, produced 12 features and received 10 Academy Awards. Commercially, those animated films have generated more than $2.5 billion in boxoffice. Disney's first animated feature under Schneider, 1986's "The Great Mouse Detective," earned $25 million; 1988's "Oliver & Company" did $53 million. Through "The Lion King," each successive film beat the past record: 1989's "The Little Mermaid" did $84 million, 1991's "Beauty and the Beast" $146 million, 1992's "Aladdin" $217 million and 1994's "The Lion King" $313 million.

Those results, Schneider says, comes from a collaboration among the wizards of illustration, writing, technology and song. "Animation is a visual medium first—it's the written word and the visual word, in a sort of marriage," Schneider says. "But it's the animation artist, the animator, who knows how to make things move and give the perception of movement. [Even] if you have great stories, great characters, great music and great technology, it takes great artists to do that. When you have a combination of all these things, I think you ultimately make successful movies."

Schneider comes from a strong theatrical background, having spent 15 years creating theatrical productions. A graduate of Purdue University, where he majored in theatre directing, Schneider earned his credentials doing plays at New York's The WPA, Playwrights Horizon and Circle Repertory. From 1976 through 1980, he served as managing director for Chicago's renowned St. Nicholas Theatre, where he produced and managed more than 60 dramas and musicals.

Schneider next moved to London to serve as general manager for Apollo Theatre Productions. In that capacity, he was involved with a number of notable productions on the West End. In 1983, he headed to Los Angeles to direct the 1984 Olympic Arts Festival. The following year, he was named president of Walt Disney Feature Animation; in 1996, he took on the additional role of president of Walt Disney Theatrical Productions.

Crediting that background for his success at Disney, Schneider cites the similarities that exist between live theatre and feature animation. "In animation, which I feel is more analogous to running a theatre company than running a movie business, a lot of things I learned in the theatre business are being applied," he says. "It's very much like running a repertory theatre—the actors, the whole thing. And we've been very successful at developing new material, whether it be 'The Lion King,' 'Beauty and the Beast' or 'The Little Mermaid.' And that's using the same skills one has to have to be successful in theatre: the ability to develop materials with a collective process."

Looking back on the changes that have taken place in the animation industry over the past decade, Schneider says animation has again become a legitimate business. "At Disney [in the early '80s], no one cared about animation. There were only 150 to 200 artists working in animation. Today, there are more than 2,200. Clearly, the movies were not grossing any money, maybe $10 million or $20 million. Now they're grossing hundreds of millions of dollars."

One can expect more of the same from Schneider in the future. Even as "Hercules" is beginning its global release, Disney has eight animated features currently in production. Walt's grand tradition lives on.

IMBESSONISM

Luc Besson, creator of "The Fifth Element" and "La Femme Nikita," garners Cinema Expo's Award of Excellence in Filmmaking

by Kim Williamson

I'm a fan of French cinema. I like the fact that they have 'freedom in their heads'—they're very free."

On a warm spring day, working inside the cool confines of James Cameron's Digital Domain facility in Venice, Calif., 38-year-old French filmmaker Luc Besson is defending the industry and country in which he gave birth to "Le Dernier Combat," "Subway," "The Big Blue" and "La Femme Nikita," the 1990 film whose global success established his reputation beyond Gaul's boundaries.

Back in fall 1994, as his first English-language and studio production, "The Professional," was about to hit theatres, Besson seemed to have less fondness for his French fellows, busy militating against Hollywood moviemaking. "I would love for the French to stop talking and work more. At 4 in the morning they're still in bed discussing the cinema. They should wake up at 8, take the pen, and work," Besson said then. Instead, the French "spend their time discussing, disagreeing.... And during this time the Americans make 200 movies."

Luc Besson (center) on the set of the Gaumont production "The Fifth Element."

But Besson, whose "The Fifth Element" (like "The Professional") is a French/American/Japanese co-production among Gaumont, Columbia and JVC, today praises French filmmakers as "artists. They take risks. They are visionary also. Since the beginning, since Cocteau and all those guys, it's always been very visionary."

As to why local European moviemaking seems to be flourishing these days, Besson says, "I think because the artist drives the movie, not the producer, not the money. When the movie is born in an office, something is wrong already. A movie needs to come from the heart. It can't be born between numbers."

Besson has had conflicts with the industry's business folks before—particularly during the stateside release of "The Big Blue" via the now-defunct Weintraub Entertainment Group, which recut the film to disastrous boxoffice—but he seems very happy with his current corporate partners. (In fact, on the day he speaks with BOXOFFICE, he is filming a commercial for JVC's diamond anniversary.) "Everybody was happy [with "The Professional"], so we do it again," Besson says. "And I have a special relationship with Gaumont because we try through the years to make everything as simple as we can. Which is: I write the script, I come, if they like it they say 'yes,' if they don't they say 'no.' And if they say 'yes,' it's because they have a good reason.

"And I respect them—I never throw money through the window, never. With the first movie I did, I had no money, and I know the price of everything. I have no pleasure in spending for nothing."

"The Fifth Element," which at $80 million is the most expensive French production ever, is a fivefold increase over Besson's previous budget high. But Besson remained calm during production ("If something costs $10, why pay $15? And if something costs $1 million because it costs $1 million, then let's spend $1 million"), and he remains calm as the film begins its worldwide rollout. "Why should I feel pressure? My work is finished when the film is finished. There's nothing I can do after that. I can give my blood for two years for the movie, but when the credits end and the movie is finished and it's over, that's it."

Asked why his films translate so well around the globe, Besson says, "Maybe because I feel as a human being. I don't think as a Frenchman, or a Parisian, or a South Parisian. [Besson was born in Paris in 1959.] I grew up in Greece and Yugoslavia, then I spent time in Paris, then I spent time in Tunisia with my father, and Rome, then in America, then in London.

"Art is the only country that is without a flag. Take a Picasso painting: No matter if you see the painting at the Guggenheim or the Louvre, it's a Picasso. It doesn't matter if Picasso was Spanish or French—it's a Picasso. I love this world of art, because it's the last safe country, where you don't need to be white or black or speak any English or French. All the people involved in an artistic process should be more aware of that: That we are lucky that we still have a country that's really free, with no frontier, and we can go from the future to the past. We can invent everything."

Regarding his Cinema Expo award, Besson says, "The only thing I understand is, a group of people somewhere love my work, and I'm happy. So it's great—it just gives me a little more pressure to make my movie better, and to open my eyes more and open my ears more, and be better on the script and things.

"My only goal if I do another one is, to make it better."

MULTIPLICITY

As in much of Europe, Irish exhibition is changing dramatically. BOXOFFICE talks to some of today's movers & shakers, and looks back at a fabled past.

by Tony Deane

STOMPIN' AT THE SAVOY: The beautiful Savoy Cinema in Dublin is one of the last survivors from the early days of Irish exhibition.

The Internet. What a wonderful vehicle for bringing people together. Case in point: our new Irish correspondent, Dubliner Tony Deane. Tony found us through BOXOFFICE ONLINE (for those of you who've been dead these last three years, that's http://www.boxoff.com*) and struck up such an interesting and insightful electronic correspondence that it was inevitable* BOXOFFICE would make him our man on the Irish scene.

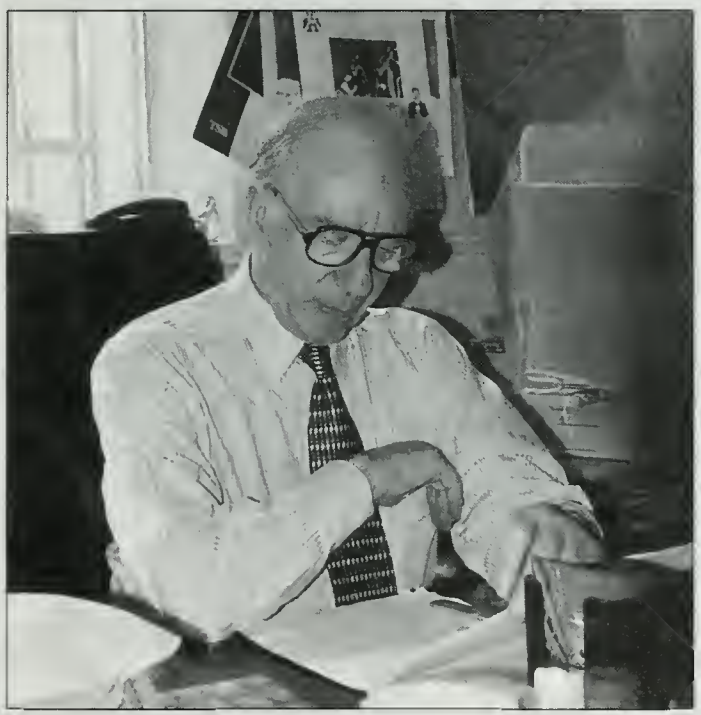
We didn't make it easy for him—no sir, not us. Tony's first assignment was nothing less than a thumbnail sketch of Irish exhibition's entire history. We couldn't be more delighted with the results.

*Here then is an Irishman's view of exhibition in his own home country. We're proud to bring it to you, and we can promise you this: you'll be hearing more from Tony Deane in the very near future.—Ray Greene, Editor-in-Chief, BOXOFFICE

THE HISTORY

It's been called the land of saints and scholars, which is ok if you're living in a country that still holds on to its old ways. The Ireland of today is lightyears away from all of those old fashioned customs people love to hear about. It's the most westerly island in Europe, the next stop being the states, and while some foreigners often mistake it for part of mainline Britain it's as far away from Britain culturally as it could possibly be.

The Irish Republic has a population of between three and four million, and research shows that it has the youngest population in Europe, each average member coming equipped with his or her own vast amount of disposable income. This is spent mostly on entertainment of some sort, and the cinema comes high among entertainment priorities.



When Giuseppe Tornatore was writing the script for his film "Cinema Paradiso," he, like all Europeans of a certain age, he could draw on memories of a childhood when the local

Irish Extra:

With Albert Kelly, Irish Exhibition Legend

President of Ireland's Independent Cinema Owners Society, Albert Kelly is a soft-spoken, hard-hitting business man who came up in what he considers to have been more fiercely competitive Irish times. "When I started there was a cinema on almost every block," he says. "Now you can see the same movie in every multiplex, while back then, with the same amount of screens and all playing different films, I feel competition was stiffer." As one of the foremost figures in Irish exhibition, his over five decades plying the screen trade make him a sort of pocket history of growth and changes within the industry.

In 1940, Albert, who had started life in the cinema business as a projectionist, bought some 16mm soccer coaching films and offered to show them to local football clubs. He would show them for a fee, and some clubs who loved the idea of seeing the top players of the sport giving instruction put the word out about him.

Due to the club by-laws, Albert was not allowed to show the films to members of the general public or to advertise his product, but word got out and he soon had packed houses. Ironically for a future exhibitor, "This was not what I wanted," says Albert, "and on arriving at the town I was amazed to see posters stuck up [by the club members] on every tree." So successful was this operation that Albert went to the National Film Institute and hired out additional films for golf societies and other special occasions.

Inevitably, Kelly took to screening feature films for special functions, which proved to be very popular. This gave him an insight into how to book product, which was to be useful at a later stage in his life. He went back and worked in several cinemas before getting an opportunity to work for a company called Sundrive Cinemas Ltd. The proud owners of three suburban cinemas, Sundrive had 18 members on its board and a managing director who hated managers (he thought them an unnecessary expense, being an ex-projectionist himself). One day he offered Albert the job of manager in one of the cinemas and it took him four weeks to decide if he would take it or not. "As far as I was concerned," Albert says wryly, "this was the nearest position to the door."

Because Sundrive was closing one of its cinemas and Albert saw this as a potential threat to continuing job stability, he took the managing job. The Kenilworth was a cinema that held 1,115 patrons. Under Albert Kelly's stewardship, Sundrive was able to keep the house almost full most of the time.

One day Albert found Sundrive's managing director dead in the chair in his office. Immediately, his circumstances changed. "This was not the ideal way to get a promotion, but while I knew there were a lot of directors in the head office, not one of them knew how to book a film."

The years Albert spent hawking films around the clubs and booking features and shorts stood to him. Sundrive put Albert in charge, and he put his mark on both of its cinemas. When he suddenly found himself with the problem of not being able to get big commercial movies at one of the houses for 14 weeks due to its rural location and the fact that standard booking practices gave urban areas over three months of exclusivity on the titles they booked, he changed that screen into an art-house and it did very well.

But the "barring order" favoring urban houses kept working against the smaller companies. Sundrive began to feel the pinch because of the long delays in getting product, so it closed the cinemas and went into real estate, a venture which proved very successful. Albert was offered one of the cinemas as payback for all his hard work and started to rent a former Sundrive house called the Classic in 1976. It took him only two years to buy the cinema for £60,000 (US$90,000) and to this day he has never had a losing year.

Albert joined Ireland's NATO-like Independent Cinemas Association in order to fight the "barring order" and discovered that the only way to stop what was happening was to go to the Restrictive Practice Board. "As far as I was concerned, this was an injustice that had to be put right," he says, "and the only way to do this was to join the ICA. When the Restrictive Practices Board sat, I found that I received a lot of attention because I spoke out." The ICA and the RPB eventually worked out a plan, and 14 weeks was reduced to 12, then to eight, and eventually as it is today: equal terms for all with the city cinemas.

Never content to stand still, Albert started Ireland's first "midnight movie" screenings and was the first to put "The Rocky Horror Picture Show" up in that time slot. Sixteen years and five prints later it's still running. "We have all sorts coming to the show and some even have their stags' night here. I recall a hearse arriving one night unannounced. Several young men got out of the front and proceeded to carry the 'corpse' [who was to be married the following morning] into the cinema. They did a tour of the auditorium, much to the delight of the patrons, and then vanished into the night!"

Albert went to London and met with leaders of the film industry who never came to Ireland. He still looks them up, his outlook being that "it's the men at the top who make the decisions, and as far as I'm concerned, if they won't come here, then I will go to them."

Travel to all the industry tradeshows is the current love of his life. Albert talks about the exhibition trade with great feeling and has a twinkle in his eye when he talks about the people he meets outside Ireland—every one a personality, to hear him tell it.

For those who haven't had the chance to make his acquaintance, it's fortunate that Albert likes to get around. If ever you want to meet a gentleman in business, make sure you shake hands with Albert Kelly, no matter where you meet him around the world.

"flea pit," as Irish moviehouses were called, was a way of life. Children of all ages went to their local cinemas, which were in abundance if you lived in the city, and movies provided a central meeting place for those who lived in the country. In the '50s, the island had at least 300 exhibition sites, each with a single screen, and only about three prints of any given film to divide between them. This caused a lot of delay for the less populated areas, as all the inventory would play in each of the cities for at least three to four weeks, with the country houses restricted from playing them until later on. By the time they got to the "sticks," the prints were in bad shape, but they would stay in rural circulation anyway for as much as the next three years.

Back then, there was a "barring order," which made sure films were not available to country cinemas because the distributors "barred" them until titles ran their course in the city. This gave city cinemagoers a guaranteed prime choice, and cinema owners everywhere else high blood pressure. The most popular genre was the western, which the Irish people went to in droves because they had an affinity for the great outdoors and the easy pace of "frontier" life. The Screen cinema (then called the Corinthian) in the heart of Dublin was nicknamed "the Ranch," because the staple diet on offer each week was the old "B" westerns.

As the capital city, Dublin held at least a third of the Irish Republic's population, and it was therefore the place where all the major exhibition and distribution companies had their offices. The largest Dublin moviehouse was the Royal, which held almost 4,000 people in one auditorium and showed a mixture of cinema and stage productions. The more sophisticated Metropole showed what would now be called "art-house" fare.

The '60s saw a change in the mood of the cinemagoing public, with the likes of Doris Day and Rock Hudson grabbing the attention. As in the states, the Irish exhibition industry was rocked by the advent of a new technology: a tiny little box called "television."

The opening of the National Television Station on New Year's Eve 1961 was almost the end for most rural cinemas, which had made due with inferior presentation conditions for decades. People liked what they could see for nothing, especially since many rural theatres had been restricted by the "barring" regulations into giving second-rate service. Almost 160 sites closed in the space of eight years, leaving only about 120 houses by 1969 to cater to the small trickle of available moviegoers. Double features became things of the past; the audience's attention span had shortened due to TV, and a two-hour program with trailers was all the public could take.

Things looked bad for the moment. But Irish exhibitors, like their American cousins, found a way out of the abyss: the "twinning" of the Savoy theatre marked a monumental occasion for Irish exhibition.

TWINNING

In the early '70s, Dublin's second largest cinema, the Savoy, was turned into a twin. Originally, the Savoy held over 2,000 patrons; when it was split, it held 800 downstairs and 1,000 upstairs. The first films shown on the "twinned" Savoy's screens were "Anne of A Thousand Days' and "Airport," both of which turned out to be Irish blockbusters. The Savoy also held a restaurant (as did most cinemas of the day). This was later turned into a 200-seat cinema, much to the horror of other exhibitors.

Brendan McCaul, vice president and general manager for Buena Vista International (U.K.) Ltd., recalls his days with Rank Cinemas, which owned the Savoy. "At the time we had committed both cinemas to two films, 'Eye Of the Needle' and 'The French Lieutenant's Woman.' We had no place for a little movie called 'Bugsy Malone,' so we put it into the 200 seater. It filled the cinema from the afternoon until late evening, seven days a week." The trade was startled at what had happened at the Savoy, and by 1978 most of the surviving larger cinemas were being split into some sort of extra capacity.

Gone was the 4,000-seat Royal which, like the Regal Rooms, had been sold to make way for an office building. Gone too were many of Dublin's fine central cinemas: The Capital was converted from an opera house to a shopping center; the Metropole also was converted to retail space.

Meanwhile, the Savoy kept subdividing, eventually growing to house six theatres. Across the road, its competition at the Carlton grew to five screens, while the Carlton's sister cinema, the Adelphi around the corner, enlarged to six. But the city still retained some single-screen cinemas which showed art-house and independent movies; in total, 24 Dublin screens were available to the public by the '80s.

The advent in the 1980s of home video created an unexpected problem for Irish exhibitors. A flood of pirated U.S. videotapes showed up in pubs and local hostelries, some located almost on the doorstep of the big urban houses. So called "art-house" cinemas, which showed foreign films with some sort of nudity, suffered most because the videos showed everything, which was against the censorship laws applied to the local cinema. The fact that you could see a first-run film in a public bar before a cinema got a chance to book it caused its own form of havoc.

In the suburbs, things were also changing. The local cinema was vanishing, replaced by supermarkets in most instances. Other exhibitors attempted to keep up with the public's appetite for entertainment by turning their houses into bowling alleys, skating rinks and bingo parlors. The one plus for those exhibitors who stayed the course was that public transport improvements and the fact that more people had motor cars were making it easier to get into the city to see the wide range of films on offer there.

UCI AND THE RISE OF THE IRISH MULTIPLEX

Fifteen successful years after existing cinemas began in earnest to split their large auditoriums into several screens, Ireland's first custom-built, dedicated multiplex was erected on the south side of Dublin in a place called Tallaght by European powerhouse UCI, and Ireland entered the modern exhibition age. Despite intensifying competition, the theatre is still one of the most important in Ireland. "It has had a tremendous effect," says Buena Vista's Brendan McCaul, "because it has become our number one grossing hall. It's also in the top three in Europe for UCI Cinemas. They were turning over one to two million admissions per year, and as a mean average [for Tallaght] you could multiply that by three. Take 40 percent of that figure and it gives you an idea of the [volume of] concession sales."

A disparaging comment circulated when the Tallaght cinema opened was that because of high unemployment in the area people had nothing better to do than to go to the movies. McCaul scoffs at such an idea. "The fact of the matter is that more people are travelling from surrounding country areas to shop in [the surrounding shopping] complexes, and while there they take in a movie. This is good for the shopper and for the owners of the sites that are adjacent to the cinemas, because both benefit."

UCI next opened a nine-screen complex on the north side of the city. While this second build didn't quite equal Tallaght's success thanks to steeper competition, it still captured the public's imagination with its state-of-the-art facilities. Several months ago, UCI opened yet another nine-screen complex in the southwest part of the city. Opened in the off-season, the new build has yet to catch on, even though it contains a wine bar. But Buena Vista's McCaul is optimistic for this new cinema. "I believe we have not seen the best of it yet," he says. "When the summer comes along, the likes of 'Batman,' 'Con Air,' 'Men In Black' and 'Jurassic Park 2' will bring people out in their droves to the cinema."

UCI's ambitious building spree changed the math dramatically for other Dublin exhibitors. Cinemas in the city were hard hit; in less than two years, they had new competition from three state-of-the-art multiplexes housing 27 new screens. Rumors abounded in the trade about the impending closure of the Carlton and the Adelphi—by this time national institutions—which shared management as part of what was then MGM's European circuit. The Carlton/Adelphi ownership reported that it had been impacted by the new multiplexes, but it intended to open a multiplex of its own, which would bring people back.

True to their word, they opened a nine-screen complex in the heart of the city, which was to have been called the MGM Multiplex. Right from the start, the MGM was dogged by all sorts of trouble. Owing to a variety of snafus at the corporate level, the cinema was finished but not opened for 18 months. By then, the complex had changed hands along with all the other MGM cinemas in Europe. When it finally opened its doors, the MGM Multiplex had a new name reflecting its changed status: it was now The Virgin Multiplex.

WARD-ANDERSON AND ABBEY FILMS

The new complex was up against the very well known and reliable Savoy's six cinemas, which include the largest screen in the country (four stories high and 60 feet in width) and the latest in digital sound. The Savoy was by now a flagship for the Ward-Anderson group, which runs it under the company's exhibition arm, Abbey Films. With over 100 screens around the country, Ward-Anderson represents a force to be reckoned with. Its history in Ireland offers a unique view of the Irish approach to the medium.

Leo Ward, who was a footballer of note in the late '40s, went into distribution with a film called "The Hills of Donegal"—a risky venture that paid off, according to his son Paul Ward, director of Abbey Films. "No one wanted to know about this movie, so my father took it to Cork [the second largest city in Ireland] and it ran for over three weeks. Suddenly, everyone wanted it."

Leo made several visits to London and picked up the rights to show a few older films. When the popular British "Carry On" comedies and the Chinese-made Bruce Lee features came out, Leo went into distribution in a big way. But the Ward family's exhibition roots went even deeper.

"The first cinema the family got involved in was in the mid-'50s in Lucan," Paul Ward remembers. "The previous owner wanted to leave the country. He had debts of £8,000 [US$12,000], and my father took over the debts and gave him £10,000 [US$15,000]."

From then on, Lee Ward and his partner Kevin Anderson took partial interests in local cinemas. They had a good working relationship with the local owners, who continued to run the cinemas for the sake of the local townfolk. In Cork city, Ward-Anderson took over the Pavilion Cinema, which then took over the Capital and the Lee. For the first time, Ward-Anderson assumed 100 percent of each business, and an exhibition empire began to spread. "I came into the business in the '70s," says Paul Ward, "when we had about 20 cinemas and solid distribution deals. But because there was a glut of films, not all of them were good."

Leo Ward had a cinema outside Dublin called the Green. Because it was not in the exact city center but about a mile away, it was classed as a second-run cinema and could not get first-run films. Necessity being the mother of invention, Leo again went to London, this time buying rights to the first seven Bond movies for about £500 [$750] each.

He ran them from week to week and took in 10 times their cost. To put a bit of icing on the cake, he then double-featured them and made yet another killing. The distributors saw the potential of the Green and allowed Ward first-run movies. Leo Ward was no longer out in the cold.

The day after Ward-Anderson took over the Savoy they reduced admissions for the day to £1 [US$1.50], and five thousand people turned up at the cinema. 'We realized [from that] that there was a pricing problem," says Paul Ward, "and reduced the afternoon performances to £2

US$3], which was half the price of the evening performance." Again the public came, and the other cinemas followed by reducing their prices.

With a £40 million [US$60 million] turnover, the Ward-Anderson group employs almost 1,000 people. They are at the moment putting multiplexes up in several Irish cities. One plan for next year is to have a 12-screen state-of-the-art cinema in the south of Dublin, where there are now some pre-existing family dwellings. "I expect there to be some objections to the plan," says Paul Ward, "but this will be our flagship cinema, with as much attention as possible to what the public wants. We intend to have everything you could want in a cinema complex."

Unlike the mighty UCI operation, Abbey Films does not have large amounts of cash to invest in cinema complexes, so it finds other methods. When the builders of a north city shopping center which included a multiplex in its design offered the site to Abbey, a deal was struck between the two companies, which saw the builders getting 50 percent of the boxoffice after the Abbey group equipped the nine-cinema complex—a "win-win" for all the parties involved. In the rural parts of the island, where construction costs are far lower than in the cities, Abbey took another route, building its own cinemas.

While UCI remains a formidable competitor, "Virgin is the company to watch" in the urban market, according to Paul Ward. "They don't buy, they rent. It's possible that they will rent the new 18-cinema complex which is going up in Quarry Vale, which is not too far away from UCI's Blanchardstown cinemas."

The north of Ireland has always been seen as a place that has a lot of troubles, but Abbey has seven cinemas there too. "The north was a natural progression for us because this is an island and the distance is not that far," says Ward. "If it had been England, it would have not been as easy for us to defend our market."

Brendan McCaul, V.P./Gen. Mgr., Buena Vista Int'l (U.K.)

Both Paul Ward and Buena Vista's McCaul agree that multiplexes have put new life into cinemagoing. "People in their '30s and '40s who have not visited a cinema in years are coming back," states Ward, "and I'm sure this will also extend to the older bracket."

Last year alone there were over 12 million admissions to cinemas on the small Irish island. Since the average ticket price runs at around £5 [US$8], almost twice the U.S. figure, Irish exhibition is looking up. Several factors point toward an even greater upsurge and a booming industry, which looks as if it is going to continue to grow well into the next century. Chief among these is the expanding economy in the Irish south, which has made Ireland one of the most economically desirable of all the European destinations.

American architects are now planning the next generation of Irish cinemas from their New York offices. The door into Europe begins in this small country, which is why there are so many computer companies setting up here, and so many Irish who emigrated to the European continent and the U.S. during leaner economic times returning home.

For the returnees and the general population, a changed moviegoing experience is what's waiting on the Irish isle. To be able to sit in an Irish cinema that is the equal of any other theatre in the world is a unique pleasure, all its own.

EAST EURO BIZ 101

by Norm Schneider

When I stepped off the airplane in Moscow for the first time, I knew the trip would be exciting. Like any other country, Russia proved to possess some things that were familiar and others that were very different from what I had expected. There's also anticipation in visiting a country rich in culture and history that I had read about and enjoyed in music, art, films and literature. You know that you are in one of the world's most important cities.

With the change of government to democratic policies, there is a hustle and bustle to adapt to the new environment of free enterprise and entrepreneurship in business. Construction is everywhere, and new businesses are opening in large numbers. This energy is apparent in most of the ex-Soviet countries. But the change is causing some problems.

The economy of many Eastern countries has been hard hit by the transition, and capital is hard to obtain. Cinemas in the large cities are mostly historic buildings that are single-house theatres that hold from 750 to 1,500 patrons. Multiplexes are starting to pop up with the aid of foreign investors that can finance such ventures and bring expertise in the operation of this form of cinemas. Stereo sound systems were rare until recently, and they have been sold and installed primarily by Western companies from Germany, America and others. Because very few products for stereo systems were manufactured in the Soviet countries, most of the systems were monaural, and installation expertise was not generally available. That is all changing!

With the expanded travel from East to West, theatre owners are building state-of-the-art cinemas with the latest technology in picture and sound. Renovation of existing cinemas is increasing as private and government-owned cinemas try to attract customers with first-class presentations.

Some areas of Eastern Europe are more progressive in their plans and progress than others. Countries like Hungary, Poland and Slovakia are moving along much faster than are Bulgaria, Romania and others in terms of the renovation and upgrading of existing sites and in the construction of new cinemas. This is partly due to the stronger support of the government in countries where culture is considered to be as important as industry.

Progressive governments understand that culture is a continuing priority, and they do not limit their resources to basic needs such as highways, schools, transportation and services. Some governments will participate in the cost of renovation in order to privatize former government-owned facilities or to help theatre owners update to current technology. The amount of support varies from country to country.

Western movies are quite popular in the East where home video is king. Major film producers are establishing new distribution channels to expand their market. This creates a greater need for stereo sound equipment and for local movie studios to offer stereo soundtracks for the theatres that have stereo playback capability. Many theatres now have one or more of the digital playback systems to present their movies in digital sound. Adding digital means a complete upgrade of the supporting components because the few, older systems cannot handle the dynamics of digital sound.

The people of the Eastern countries are optimistic and excited about the future of cinemas in their homelands. I have made many trips to this region and have developed great friendships and strong business relationships with my new contacts. I was delighted to discover the warm, hospitable and friendly nature of people in the East. It's easy to see the problems they face in trying to transition to a new way of doing business, and it makes one want to "pitch in" and help.

Norm Schneider is the chief executive officer of Norcross, Ga.-based SMART Devices, Inc., a manufacturer of cinema sound products and systems. Schneider recently oversaw the installation of SMART's "Total Support" sound system in the Cinema Khudojestvenny, the premier (and Premier!) moviehouse—six blocks from the Kremlin—at which the Moscow Film Festival is held.

A NOTE TO OUR READERS: Our "From Where I Sit" section is designed to provide professionals working in the motion picture business and related industries a forum for the exchange of ideas. Think of it as a space where you can unveil a new idea or approach, or discuss how traditional methods might best evolve as moviemaking and moviegoing change.

Those who would like to contribute essays of up to 1,000 words for publication in BOXOFFICE should write to the magazine at 6640 Sunset Blvd., Suite 100, Hollywood CA 90028, or fax us at (213) 465-5049, or send via E-mail to boxoffice@earthlink.net. Also, mail a black-and-white photograph and a short biography when you make your submission.

As the production and exhibition industries move into their second century, and the modern world prepares for its 21st, there are plenty of issues facing the business. Some have been with us since the dawn of the movie theatre: For example, how can exhibitors attract more patrons more frequently, and how can they make moviegoers' stays more exciting—and how can they grow profits at the same time? Others are more specific to our era: E.g., As megaplex operators build out America, will neighborhood competition increase?

Sound, picture, projection, seating, architecture, zoning, concessions, legal and social issues, even the movies themselves—these and more are all topics for debate. Let's hear from you on one of them!

IF THEY KNEW WHAT YOU WERE MISSING: Part Two

WHY TODAY'S MOTION PICTURE SOUND SYSTEMS FAIL TO MAKE THE GRADE AND WHY THEY CAN'T SOUND BETTER

by John F. Allen

Motion picture sound is critically important in setting the emotional atmosphere of a film. Sound alone is often the determining factor in an audience knowing if a scene is a comedy or tragedy. Obviously, the better the theatre's sound presentation, the better the film works. If sound is, as some insist, fully half the show, how can exhibitors best exploit its potential? BOXOFFICE contributing writer John F. Allen continues his important series of articles exploring the current state of movie theatre sound and providing some valuable guidance. Part one was published in the April 1997 issue of BOXOFFICE; parts three and four will follow later this year.

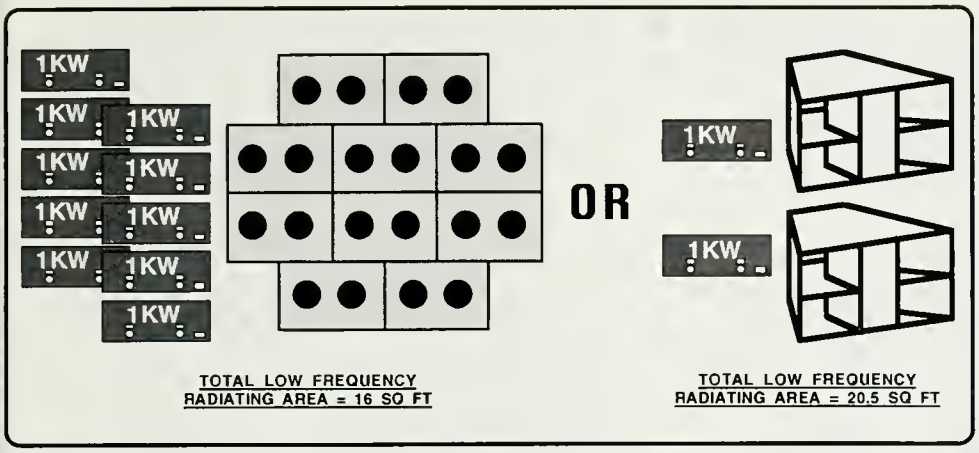
Part one of this series was devoted to a detailed analysis of the current state of the sound systems in today's movie theatres and some of the many complex reasons that preclude them from being able to reproduce digital soundtracks. Much of the article covered speakers used behind motion picture screens and explained why the majority of these loudspeakers are simply too small. Although all the visual action takes place on the screen, the sound system is installed throughout the theatre. The all-important surround speakers are often overlooked as one of the most vital components of the experience that attending a theatre is supposed to be. In this installment, I shall explain why the surrounds usually fail to deliver what they should, as well as discuss subwoofer and power amplifier deficiencies that audiences are also to likely to endure.

WHAT IS BAD SOUND?

Perhaps I should once again state what I believe should qualify as "bad sound." Understandable dialogue is certainly essential for telling a story, but it is hardly enough. Any sound reproduction that is unnatural or colored in tone, or is lacking in fullness or dynamic range, or that is unfaithful to the recording in any way, should not be regarded as acceptable. Presentations often encountered in which music or background sounds are too loud, too dull or altogether inaudible should not be regarded as acceptable. Phony, distorted and inadequate bass is widely prevalent in this industry. (Just think of all the subwoofers that have failed.) Finally, it must be understood that the typical "honky" dialogue sound so prominent in movie theatres for so many years is bad sound. Voices simply don't sound that way unless someone is speaking through a hose.

SURROUND SPEAKERS

It's hard to imagine a mistake one could make in designing or installing a surround array or surround speakers that is not commonplace in today's movie theatres. Many—all too many—surround speakers have required replacement, sometimes repeatedly, over the years. It would almost seem that we are now quite accustomed to hearing of such failures with virtually every opening of a new action picture, particularly those with a digital stereo track.



There ought to be no debate that a safety margin of some amount is mandatory. But there is debate as to how much the safety margin should be.

Surround speakers serve a critical role by bringing the audience into the film. Surrounds create the atmosphere. In addition, films like "Twister" and "Independence Day" use the surrounds for some enormous sound effects. These effects can demand bass levels that exceed those produced at the same time by the subwoofers. Yet surround speakers typically fail to produce anything beyond some kind of noise during the loudest scenes. The rest of the time they hardly sound like they're on at all, even though they are supposed to be. (How often has that complaint been heard?) The sound of the surrounds should match the sound from the screen.

Of course, the final issue that must be faced is that, due to poor placement among other things, most surround systems don't ultimately surround anything. Listeners all too often localize to, and can even feel attacked by, the surround speaker or group of speakers to which they're closest. (See "Why Surround Systems Don't Usually Work," BOXOFFICE, March 1983, p. 68.)

Returning to the theme that most theatre speakers are too small, the vast majority of surround systems installed today are also lacking in size and performance. For theatres equipped for either Dolby SR or digital, I would advise that surround speakers with anything smaller than a 12-inch woofer should not be considered. Beyond that, surround presentations cannot improve until far more attention is paid to speaker placement. The goal should be that no localization to individual speakers or wall of speakers should occur from any seat in the house.

Due to their height restrictions, theatres with stadium seating and balconies require a far greater level of skill and understanding of coverage geometries than is generally available to this industry at this time. The usual practice of locating surround speakers in theatres by habit and mere guessing needs to go the way of the hand-cranked projector. The bottom line is this: If you're in a theatre where you can "feel surrounded" only in the center seats, the surround system in that theatre, by definition, fails to surround everyone not seated in the center. This is, of course, virtually the entire audience for every show, every day, week after week.

Surround speakers of sufficient size, output and quality, properly placed for zero localization, can and do significantly—almost magically—enhance the motion picture experience for all films, large and small.

SUBWOOFERS

As noted earlier, the number of subwoofer failures this industry has experienced is very high indeed. Frankly, there is no excuse for this. If a sound system is properly designed and equipped, its loudspeakers should never fail. I repeat, never. As with both the screen and surround speakers, most theatres are presently outfitted with terribly inadequate subwoofer systems—how inadequate depends on the theatre. We do know that subwoofers are required to deliver peak levels of at least 115 dB sound pressure level (SPL) in the center of a theatre. To do this in, say, a 100-foot-long theatre, the subwoofer system must be able to deliver 139 dB SPL at 1 meter, according to the inverse square law and actual measurements done in a theatre. Adding a 6 dB safety margin is a good design practice. This protects the drivers from damaging overloads and also allows for real-world signal conditions that will actually push the subwoofer higher than the theoretical peak levels. This brings the total output requirement at one meter to 145 dB SPL in a theatre 100 feet long. Subwoofer amplifiers must also be equipped with clipping protection or limiting for those occasions when even this isn't enough. Believe me, it does happen.

Because typical subwoofers quit at around 124 dB, theatres need more than one or two to do the job. In fact, a 500-seat, 100-foot-long theatre requires 10 standard subwoofers or two high-efficiency subwoofers. Either approach will provide the power output required. The radiating area of 10 standard subwoofers is 16 square feet vs. more than 20 for the two high-efficiency units, but they are at least closer. (See Figure 1, above.) If one is using direct radiator subwoofers, systems with 18-inch drivers would make a better choice. Most theatres are equipped with only one or two standard subwoofers if they have them at all, so the shortfall in subwoofer power in these theatres is truly severe. (See "Digital Subwoofers," BOXOFFICE, June 1995, p. 48.)

If a sound system is properly designed and equipped, its loudspeakers should never fail. I repeat again: Never!

AMPLIFIERS

Another of the more important factors contributing to the lack of performance in motion picture theatre sound systems is the power amplifiers. As with most of the installed loudspeakers, the amplifiers often found driving them are too small for their task. Determining the power required for any channel in any sound system is a very straightforward exercise. Using the speaker's one watt, one meter sensitivity, the maximum peak SPL of the program material involved and the distance at which that level must be delivered, we can quickly calculate the power in watts required. We then add 6 dB, or multiply the watts by four; this adds a safety margin so that the amplifiers never run out of power and clip. This is critically important in assuring a long life for the speakers as well as, obviously, keeping the sound clean.

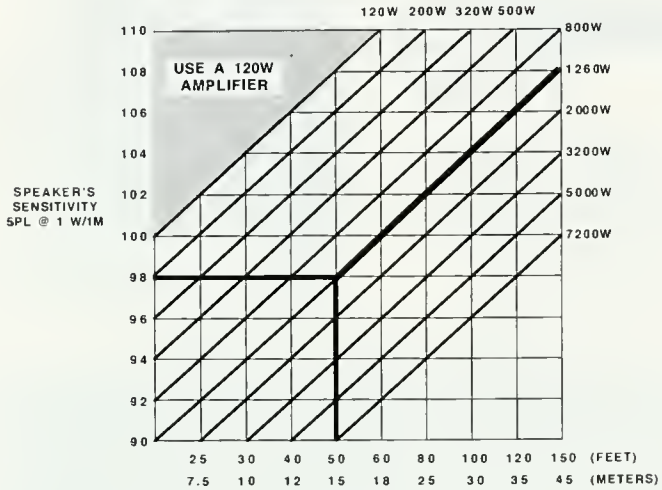
There ought to be no debate that a safety margin of some amount is mandatory. But there is debate as to how much that safety margin should be. Some have said it can be as little as 3 dB, which is twice the power demanded by the peak levels. In the real world, however, this is not enough, for at least two good reasons. The first is that, due to its complex nature, real program material can frequently use more power than theoretical calculations indicate. Second, and just as important, is that we are dealing with equalized sound systems. If the equalization requires the bass control to be turned up just 3 dB, as is often the case, that 3 dB immediately doubles the amplifier power required. Some common surround speakers need a 6 dB bass boost. These equalizations cannot be ignored. So, when designing a sound system, one must factor in the typical amount of equalization anticipated by the speakers employed and increase the amplifier power accordingly.

SO HOW LOUD DO MOVIES GET?

Peak levels for digital motion picture soundtracks are 105 dB SPL for each screen channel, 102 dB SPL for each surround channel and, as stated earlier, 115 dB SPL for the subwoofer channel. Adding 6 dB brings the design criteria up to 111 dB SPL, 108 dB SPL and 121 dB SPL respectively, as measured in the center of the theatre. Sound systems built to these specifications will not clip and can be considered reliable.

Unfortunately, these common-sense practices are seldom followed. As an example, one 500-seat theatre I visited advertised its sound as "state-of-the-art." In some sense, I suppose, you could say it was, as it just poured out distortion with films like "Twister" and "Independence Day." Doing the math, I calculated that the clipping levels for this sound system were 102 dB SPL for the screen channels, 99 dB SPL for the surround channels and 103 dB SPL for the subwoofer. At a minimum, this meant that the screen and surround channels were 50 percent too small. The subwoofer channel was a whopping 94 percent too small. If one were to include a 6 dB safety margin, these shortfalls become four times worse.

Clearly, it is an appalling situation for this industry when such a system can be sold as a quality digital-ready package. One reason this continues to happen has been a reluctance on the part of some to own up to the real power demands of digital stereo—even though anyone with a calculator could figure it out for themselves. On separate occasions, two manufacturers have stated to me their feeling that if they told the truth "no one would buy" their processors. I strongly disagree. The industry is far better served by the most honest and forthcoming advice. Without it, everyone on both sides of the boxoffice loses out.



The following text is offered as a ready-to-use amplifier power specification for exhibitors and others responsible for installing motion picture sound systems. And, published for the first time anywhere, Tables 1, 2 and 3 provide a quick reference for the minimum amplifier power requirements for cinema sound systems.

dB SPL for each surround channel and 115 dB SPL for the subwoofer channel. An additional 6 dB of headroom shall also be required to provide the loudspeakers with sufficient power headroom to prevent amplifier clipping.

Therefore, each full-range screen channel shall be powered to produce levels in the center of the theatre of at least 111 dB SPL as the amplifier(s) reach(es) maximum power. Each left and right surround channel shall be powered to deliver levels of at least 108 dB SPL in the center of the theatre as the amplifier(s) reach(es) maximum power.

The subwoofer channel shall be powered to deliver a level of at least 121 dB SPL in the center of the theatre as the amplifier(s) reach(es) maximum power. No power compression, self protection limiting action or bandwidth limiting action shall occur in a subwoofer channel at levels less than 121 dB SPL in the center of a theatre as calculated using the inverse square law.

Finally, a note about speaker sensitivity: Some speaker manufacturers provide a sensitivity specification as measured with a 1 watt input. Others show a 2.83 Volt input. There is a significant difference that must be taken into consideration. If a speaker under consideration is specified at 2.83 Volts, the speaker's minimum impedance specification must checked. If the minimum impedance is 8 ohms, the speaker's rated sensitivity may be used directly when calculating the required power according to the inverse square law.

If the minimum impedance is found to be around 4 ohms, then a 2.83 Volt input is actually 2 watts. In this case, a 3 dB deduction shall be made from the given 2.83 Volt sensitivity specification to get the speaker's true 1 watt sensitivity.

OUT OF THIS WORLD

Berlin Movie Fans See Films Via 'Satellite' at the Sputnik by Melissa Morrison

THEATRE TO THE REUNIFIED : The entrance to Berlin, Germany's Sputnik Theatre which is neighbor to the infamous, and now defunct, Berlin Wall.

In the early '60s, the Sputnik Theatre's owners faced a unique and traumatic marketing problem: Somebody built a huge wall through the cinema's Berlin, Germany neighborhood, and half of the Sputnik's patrons were threatened with death if they tried to cross it.

Needless to say, admissions suffered.

Eight years ago, however, revolution tore the Berlin Wall down, and Sputnik's owners, Filme-X, faced another challenge: how to run a profitable cinema for two distinct communities—one rich, the other poor; one worldly, the other starving for Western entertainment.

The resulting strategy, implemented by Filme-X's young managers, seems one more of ad hoc tinkering than textbook formula. When Filme-X took over Sputnik in 1984, it programmed art films. When that didn't fly, the program changed more successfully to mainstream movies, with special programs highlighting, for example, children's films and German films.

The new approach seems to be working. The Sputnik has broken even for the last three years, says Martin Protze-Zwick, a deputy director at Filme-X. And despite the fact that it's not exactly raking in the Deutsche marks yet, the company is in no hurry to unload the theatre, which is a beloved fixture of the neighborhood and of architectural aficionados.

Built in 1954 in the north Berlin region of Wedding, the 300-seat cinema was first named the Clou and outfitted with early Cinemascope technology, as well as one of the first wide screens. It had a simple and elegant design that writers praise as a perfect example of '50s architecture, including kidney-shaped motifs and a quilted diamond pattern on the auditorium walls. When the pharmaceutical company Schering paid for a DM 500,000 (US$335,000) renovation in the early '90s (as an act of charity to preserve a valuable landmark), it didn't change a facet of what a government official, in a 1992 article in the newspaper Der Tagesspeigel, called "one of the last preserved creations of a cinema culture which has already been forgotten."

Before the Wall was built, the Clou was popular with East Germans, who could pay East German marks to see Western films. The theatre was considered one of the "capitalist propaganda weapons at that time," according to the 1992 Der Tagesspeigel article.

After the Berlin Wall was constructed about a mile away, the theatre went into a tailspin. It changed its identity several times, including stints as a porn house and a Turkish cinema, and it had a succession of owners. "We know of about 11," says Protze-Zwick. "We're the longest owners in 30 years." Somewhere along the way, the theatre's name was changed to Sputnik.

With flaring white eaves over its glass-wall entrance, the Sputnik somehow evokes the flying nun. Inside, the pale-yellow lobby is spacious, with rounded corners instead of hard edges. Sinuous brass-colored railings lead the few steps up to the auditorium's two entrances.

On a winter weekday evening, the lobby is dead. "This is normal," shrugs an overall-clad projectionist before returning to her booth from the snack bar, where she's been chatting with the concession attendant.

Like classic movie houses everywhere, the Sputnik has had to adjust to changes in the neighborhood. Today, the area is tidy and quiet and home to many Turkish families. Across the street from the Sputnik is a wedding-dress shop that features in its window an elaborate pink creation with a Muslim-style headdress.

"It's very difficult, because it's in a quarter of Berlin that doesn't have a lot of businesses around the cinema," says Cordula Bester, a distributor liaison. "People live there but don't shop there. They go to the Ku'damm." The Ku'damm is named for Kurfurstendamm street, the area's major artery through what is the center of former West Berlin. In Berlin, the Ku'damm is cinema central, and is where East Berliners first went when the Wall came down to see all the glitzy capitalist propaganda denied them under communism.

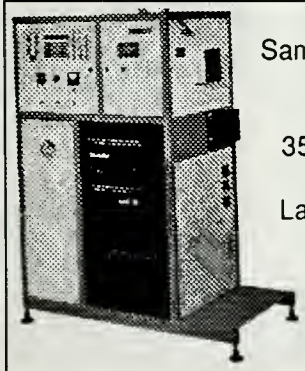
Bester says the public's initial enthusiasm for the Ku'damm has waned a bit since then, but they haven't necessarily transferred their moviegoing to the more conveniently-located Sputnik. "It takes time for people to [discover the Sputnik] again," she says. "The young people don't know to go there."

Reunification isn't complete in other aspects as well. Ticket prices are still lower in the former East Berlin, around 9 marks (US$6), while in former West Berlin they're 10 to 12 marks, and 15 to 16 marks at Zoo Palast. (The Sputnik charges 10 marks.)

The theatre is grappling with other forces besides reunification. The Wall fell about the same time the multiplex arrived in Europe. "You can't tell the effects apart," says Protze-Zwick.

Filme-X is soon to join the multiplex wave. The company, which currently operates seven cinemas—five in Berlin, one in the East Berlin suburb of Potsdam, and one in Hamburg—is working with a partner to convert an East Berlin two-screen cinema called the Coliseum to a 10-screen that's scheduled to open in October.

Despite the company's plans, both Protze-Zwick and Bester betray some suspicion of the multiplex phenomenon. Twenty-five multiplexes are planned for Berlin by UCI, Warner, German companies and other industry leaders, Protze-Zwick says.



"If all those are realized," he says, "many will go broke because you can imagine if there are about 50,000 seats in Berlin, every Berliner has to go 10 times a year to the cinema. Currently, it's three times a year."

"It's crazy," Bester says.

Filme-X sees a future for single-screen cinemas like Sputnik. A recent German government study found that for older cinemas to survive the advent of the multiplex, they have to be kept technologically up-to-date and carve out audience niches with special programs. That pretty much sums up what Filme-X is doing.

"We have to think about the program and perhaps schedule special events to draw the people, such as music," Protze-Zwick says. "We tried, but we have to do it more."

The Sputnik's made it this far, and plans to get through the next few years while the two parts of Berlin complete the process of fusing into one and the local cinema industry adjusts. The Sputnik survived the Cold War and the Berlin Wall. Filme-X is confident it can survive the invasion of the multiplex as well.

GOOD AS GOLD

BOXOFFICE covers the Cannes festival's 50th anniversary

(CANNES)—Although it didn't take the Palme d'Or (which was shared by Abbas Kiarostami's "The Taste of Cherries" and Shohei Imamura's "The Eel," reviewed below), Atom Egoyan's "The Sweet Hereafter" emerged from Cannes bearing the most prizes. The Canadian production garnered the Grand Prix, the Ecumenical Jury Prize and the Fipresci critics nods. Although Johnny Depp's directing debut, "The Brave," fared poorly with audiences, actor-turned-filmmaker Gary Oldman saw his "Nil By Mouth" bring Kathy Burke a best actress win. Other key prizes: Sean Penn, best actor for Nick Cassavetes' "She's So Lovely"; Wong Kar-wai, best director for "Happy Together"; James Schamus, best screenplay for "The Ice Storm," reviewed on P. 81; filmmaker Manuel Poirier, the Jury Prize for "Western"; and cinematographer Thierry Arbogast, the Technical Prize for "She's So Lovely" and "The Fifth Element," reviewed on P. 91.

SUNDAY ★★★★

Starring David Suchet, Lisa Harrow and Jared Harris. Directed by Jonathan Nossiter. Written by James Lasdun and Jonathan Nossiter. Produced by Jonathan Nossiter and Alix Madigan. A CFP release. Drama. Unrated. Running time: 92 min.

Sunday is a day of rest, generally the least eventful day of the week. But filmmaker Jonathan Nossiter has constructed a Sunday of a very different stripe, one on which people collide in intriguing and unexpected ways.

Sundays hold little significance for Olive (David Suchet); a former IBM employee left homeless by a layoff, he finds it just another day to kill until returning to the shelter where he sleeps. But when he crosses paths with Madeleine (Lisa Harrow), a high-strung actress who is no longer young, she mistakes him for a famous director. Attracted to her and flattered, Oliver plays along; he becomes "Matthew Delacorta" and spends the day with her. Together, these two slightly off-kilter people develop a fantasy—or is it a folie a deux?—in which both can hope for career and personal redemption. But Madeleine's estranged husband (Larry Pine) and the other men who share Oliver's shelter present forces of reality that threaten to sour this fragile accord.

One of "Sunday's" strengths is that the audience can never tell whether Madeleine and Oliver are doing something healthy or dangerous together; one is constantly unsure of what will happen next. Powerfully honest and risky performances from Suchet and Harrow propel the film, which provides as bleak a view of the streets and row houses of Queens as may be imagined. Writer/director Nossiter, in his debut feature film (he previously helmed the well-received documentary "Resident Aliens"), shows a deft touch with suspense, character and milieu. "Sunday" is a film filled with small pleasures: a lovely scene in a Greek Orthodox church; an exchange of stories between the leads in which truth takes on the power of fiction. Ultimately, this thought-provoking work adds up to a unique and memorable experience, one well worthy of the two awards it took at Sundance.—Cathy Thompson-Georges

THE EEL (UNAGI) ★★1/2

Starring Koji Yakusho and Misa Shimizu. Directed by Shohei Imamura. Written by Motofumi Tomikawa, Daisuke Tengan and Shohei Imamura. Produced by Hisa Iino. No stateside distributor set. Drama. Japanese-language; subtitled. Running time: 117 min. Shared the Palme d'Or.

The eel is the beloved pet of Takuro (Koji Yakusho), who's been paroled after spending eight years in prison for stabbing his unfaithful wife and her lover to death. Outside, he saves a young woman (Misa Shimizu) who has attempted suicide; she is hired to work at his shop and they predictably fall in love. Both of their pasts threaten to destroy the relationship.

Yakusho gives a good performance in the lead role, but the screenplay doesn't go beneath the surface of the characters. Writer/director Shohei Imamura more deservedly won the Palme d'Or in 1983 for "The Ballad of Narayama." Here, however, he tries unsuccessfully to mix different styles. Fantasy scenes (oddly reminiscent of "Trainspotting") in which Takuro imagines himself swimming with his pet are an imaginative contrast to his daily routine. But scenes in which a neighbor makes elaborate plans to greet an alien spaceship and a climatic slapstick fight with police ruin the serious mood set by the main love story.—Ed Scheid

THE ICE STORM ★★1/2

Starring Kevin Kline, Sigourney Weaver, Joan Allen, Christina Ricci and Elijah Wood. Directed by Ang Lee. Written and produced by James Schamus. A Fox Searchlight release. Drama. Rated R for sexuality and drug use, including scenes involving children, and for language. Running time: 112 min. Won the best screenplay prize at Cannes.

A cold, somewhat distant yet oddly intriguing film from director Ang Lee, "The Ice Storm" is aptly named. Based on Rick Moody's satirical novel and set on Thanksgiving weekend of 1973, the film portrays two suburban American families who, despite smiley-faced exteriors, are emotionally frigid.

Living comfortably in New England, Ben Hood (Kevin Kline) and his wife Elena (Joan Allen) are raising two teenagers. They are good friends with their neighbors Janey and Jim Carver (Sigourney Weaver and Jamey Sheridan)—although, unbeknownst to Elena, Ben is sleeping with Janey. Meanwhile, hormones rage through the Carver and Hood children alike: Wendy Hood (Christina Ricci), buzzing at the prospect of sexual discovery, has set out to seduce both Mikey Carver (Elijah Wood) and his younger brother, while Paul Hood (Tobey Maguire) lusts after a prep school co-ed. Their lies and indiscretions are all revealed one freezing night on which their region is hit by the worst ice storm in 30 years.

"The Ice Storm" has several redeeming features: the performances are uniformly solid, the production design and costumes impressively authentic, and the direction aptly understated. Ang Lee, who turned his lens on Taiwanese family matters in the comedy "The Wedding Banquet" and British domestic ways in "Sense and Sensibility," shows an astute eye for American family politics. Rather than self-consciously announcing its evocation of the '70s, the details of the era come through piecemeal: in conversation (couple-swapping is trendy), on TV (Nixon insists that he is not a crook), in their furniture (the Carvers have a waterbed). The cinematography by Frederick Elmes ("Blue Velvet") is appropriately crisp and clean, lit in a way that effectively conveys glacial familial relations. Unfortunately, however, the film has the same effect on the viewer. Rather than being moved or transfixed, one feels frozen and impartial, almost as disengaged as the characters themselves.—Lael Loewenstein

THE BLACKOUT 1/2

Starring Matthew Modine, Dennis Hopper, Claudia Schiffer and Beatrice Dalle. Directed by Abel Ferrara. Written by Marla Hanson, Christ Zois and Abel Ferrara. Produced by Edward R. Pressman and Clayton Townsend. No stateside distributor set. Drama. Not yet rated. Running time: 97 min.

For "The Blackout," Abel Ferrara has moved from the dark New York streets of "King of New York" and "Bad Lieutenant" to the bright colors of Miami. Judging from the disappointing results of the film, the trip was not a success. Matty (Matthew Modine) is a famous movie star addicted to drugs and alcohol. Modine is not believable as an addict; he has too amiable a screen persona to be convincing as someone deep in the depths of drug and alcohol dependency. Beatrice Dalle ("Betty Blue") and supermodel Claudia Schiffer (in her feature debut) are adequate as the one-dimensional women in Matty's life.

Dennis Hopper plays a sleazy filmmaker who has videotaped many of Matty's activities. Matty's decadent lifestyle is too much, even for his uninhibited girlfriend Annie (Dalle). Matty is so devastated by a revelation from Annie that he uses even more drugs and blacks out. Eighteen months later, Matty is amazingly clean and sober and living in New York with Susan (Schiffer), who doesn't get high or drink. But Matty begins to have nightmares that he might have committed a murder; he returns to Miami to learn whether he is indeed a killer.

In previous films, Ferrara used his characters' dissipation to explore their emotional torment and provided strong roles for many actors, including Harvey Keitel, Christopher Walken and Chris Penn. In his latest, the characters and situations are superficially developed. The dialogue is insipid and at times is almost drowned out by throbbing music. "The Blackout" has uncharacteristically slack pacing for a Ferrara work, and the film is further spoiled by pretentious ranting by Hopper's character. Many scenes are so melodramatic and overdone that the film becomes unintentionally funny, especially in the ludicrous ending borrowed from a Hollywood classic.—Ed Scheid

PRIVATE CONFESSIONS (ENSKILDA SAMTAL) ★★★★1/2

Starring Pernilla August, Max von Sydow and Samuel Froler. Directed by Liv Ullmann. Written by Ingmar Bergman. Produced by Ingrid Dahlberg. No stateside distributor set. Drama. Swedish-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 135 min.

Liv Ullmann, who acted in nine films of Ingmar Bergman, is now the director of Bergman's script for "Private Confessions." (Ullmann has cut the film from a longer version that appeared on Swedish TV.) "Private Confessions" continues Bergman's exploration of his parents' troubled marriage that began in "The Best Intentions," which won the Palme d'Or at Cannes in 1992.

The film begins in 1925. Anna (Pernilla August) feels stifled in her marriage to Henrik (Samuel Froler), a minister. (Both August and Froler played the characters in "The Best Intentions.") Now, Anna has a younger lover (Tomas Hanzon). The film is structured on conversations about the relationships Anna has with her confirmation priest (Bergman regular Max von Sydow), her husband, her lover and a female friend. The last conversation is a flashback between the 18-year-old Anna and the priest.

The perceptive script continues Bergman's probing into the complexities and frequent deceptions involved in relationships. A scene in which Anna confesses the affair to her husband is particularly strong: A calm conversation gradually explodes into anger and violence. Ullmann's direction (this is her third turn behind the camera) is superb. As in her films with Bergman, the lens explores what Ullmann calls the "geography of faces" to subtly reveal a character. The impeccable images are from Sven Nykvist, Bergman's longtime cinematographer.

August's performance is extraordinary, showing the wide range of Anna's passionate feelings; her work surpasses even her turn in "The Best Intentions," which won her the Best Actress prize at Cannes. Von Sydow gives his character a warm compassion—his final reunion with Anna as he is dying is particularly affecting—and Froler is impressive as the volatile husband.—Ed Scheid

THE TRUCE (LA TREGUA) ★★1/2

Starring John Turturro and Rade Serbedzija. Directed by Francesco Rosi. Written by Francesco Rosi, Stefano Rulli and Sandro Petraglia. Produced by Leo Pescarolo and Guido De Laurentis. No stateside distributor set. Drama. Shown in English- and Italian-language versions. Running time: 115 min.

"The Truce" is an adaptation of the memoirs of Primo Levi, an Italian chemist who was imprisoned in Auschwitz. The film follows Levi ("Quiz Show's" John Turturro) through the chaotic times after Auschwitz is liberated in 1945. Levi lives in a Soviet resettlement camp and follows a labyrinthine journey through Eastern Europe to return to his home in Italy. He begins to reconnect to his emotions, which he had kept dormant during his time in Auschwitz.

With his gaunt appearance, Turturro is convincing as a concentration camp inmate. He expertly conveys both Levi's pain and the strength to survive as a witness to the suffering. A weakness of the screenplay keeps Levi a passive observer reacting to other characters, including a Greek prisoner played with vitality by Rade Serbedzija ("The Saint"). The most successful scenes are large-scale, like the opening in which the gates of Auschwitz are pulled down, or when the euphoric former prisoners begin their train ride home. But "The Truce" contains too many characters and scenes that are familiar from other films set in the same period.—Ed Scheid

THE WELL ★★★1/2

Starring Pamela Rabe and Miranda Otto. Directed by Samantha Lang. Written by Laura Jones. Produced by Sandra Levy. No stateside distributor set. Suspense/drama. Not yet rated. Run time: 101 min.

Based on a novel by Elizabeth Jolley, "The Well" is a notable feature debut for Australian director Samantha Lang. The film shows the chilling consequences when a car driven by a young woman ("Love and Other Catastrophes'" Miranda Otto) runs over a man on a deserted road.

Hester ("Paradise Road's" Pamela Rabe), a middle-aged woman, has hired the much younger Catherine (Otto) to help with the work on her isolated farm. A surprisingly close friendship develops. After the car accident, Hester hides the body in an unused well; they later discover that money they had hidden is missing and believe that the dead man was the thief. One of them must go down the well to retrieve their cash.

Jones has shot striking scenes set in a stark Down Under landscape that is an effective reflection of Hester's repression. Rabe and Otto are a potent combination as the possessive Hester and the uninhibited Catherine, and the film becomes an absorbing story of dependence and manipulation that takes some very clever and unexpected turns.—Ed Scheid

WELCOME TO SARAJEVO ★★★1/2

Starring Stephen Dillane, Woody Harrelson and Marisa Tomei. Directed by Michael Winterbottom. Written by Frank Cottrell Boyce. Produced by Graham Broadbent and Damian Jones. A Miramax release. Documentary/drama. Not yet rated. English- and Bosnian-language; English subtitles. Running time: 100 min.

One of the most acclaimed films at Cannes, "Welcome to Sarajevo" is a complex, deeply moving story of life in Sarajevo during the Bosnian war. As told from the perspective of several English-speaking journalists stationed in Sarajevo, and with the help of actual news footage, the war is portrayed in its unrelenting and inexplicable violence. Yet the film never feels like a documentary; as directed by Michael Winterbottom ("Jude"), it's an extraordinarily affecting, personal, at times uplifting tale.

The choice to have the story unfold through the British and American journalists' eyes is especially effective; they serve as the audience's surrogates and interpreters. Not only do they help to render understandable much of the Bosnian political situation, they also draw us into the tale. A motley crew comprised of seasoned news correspondent Michael Henderson (stage actor Stephen Dillane), hard-working producer Jane Carson ("Shallow Grave's" Kerry Fox), novice reporter Annie McGee ("The River Runs Through It's" Emily Lloyd) and jaded, cynical correspondent Flynn (Woody Harrelson), the press corps strive to maintain their objectivity. When Henderson begins to broadcast daily from a local orphanage, however, it soon becomes clear that objectivity is impossible. And when a young American aid worker ("The Perez Family's" Marisa Tomei) arrives to help some of the children escape, Henderson decides to smuggle out a girl to whom he has become attached.

"Welcome to Sarajevo" is a flawed but potent film. At times its emotional pull (desperation etched on the orphans' faces) is so strong it threatens to overwhelm you, yet Winterbottom maintains a careful balance between sentiment and fact. And there's a powerful lesson here. The news footage of the wounded Sarajevans is brutally shocking, but perhaps no more shocking than the footage of actual politicians and diplomats, showing the blind eye turned on Bosnia by a world too busy to help.—Lael Loewenstein

THE WONDERFUL YEARS THAT SUCKED ★★1/2

Starring Libuse Safrankova and Ondrej Vetchy. Directed by Petr Nikolaev. Written by Jan Novak. Produced by Jiri Jezek. A Space Films production; no stateside distributor set. Comedy. Czech-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 109 min.

This film ("Bajecna Leta Pod Psa") is based on a popular Czech novel by writer Michal Viewegh, and something was lost in the translation from book to screen. It's about a family trying to keep it together despite the indignities and absurdities of life in communist Czechoslovakia. The movie covers three decades, which perhaps accounts for its choppiness: Events occur whose impacts aren't felt in the next scene; characters disappear abruptly; chunks of time elapse at hyperspeed.

The major pleasure is its quirky family members. Dad (Ondrej Vetchy), a happy-go-lucky economist, eventually cracks under the strain of being "politically visible." His modest wife ("Kolya's" Libuse Safrankova) schedules herself to give birth on a day she knows no male doctors are on duty. And son Kvido (played as a child by Jan Zahalka, as a teen by Jakub Wehrenberg) uses his prematural vocabulary to comment perceptively on his parents' struggles, even as he's befuddled by his own life's events.—Melissa Morrison

ANOTHER MOTHER ★★

Starring Janis Reinis and Arys Adamsons. Directed by Paula van der Oest. Written by Paula van der Oest and Stan Lapinski. Produced by Rene Scholten. A Studio Nieuwe Gronden production; no stateside distributor set. Drama. Dutch- and Latvian-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 96 min.

The symbolism isn't exactly subtle in "Another Mother" ("De Nieuwe Moeder"), which contrasts life in Western and Eastern Europe. Such crudeness can be forgiven as long as characters remain flesh and blood, which they do here until the last fifth of the movie. But the ending is groan-inducing mush—which is a shame, because the film is a Kleenex-clutcher till that point.

Fed up with post-Communist Latvia's scarcities, a father, Juris, takes off with his mute young son, Elvis. The two travel to Holland—Juris being fueled by decades-old correspondence with a Dutch penpal, Marie, who has told of a country of opportunity. As the pair draw closer, voiceovers of her letters describe her life's trajectory. Along the way, Juris and Elvis encounter Western Values, as embodied by a socialist hippie, neofascists and, finally, Marie's materialistic family. It's in Juris' encounter with Marie's Lolita-esque daughter—those darn sexually rapacious 15-year-olds!—in the inevitable "seduction" of the East by the West that reality flees the movie.—Melissa Morrison

Starring Illeana Douglas, Paulina Porizkova and Julie Warner. Directed by Dana Lustig. Written by Annete Goliti-Gutierrez. Produced by Ram Bergman, Dana Lustig, Carole Curb Nemoy and Mike Curb. A Legacy release. Romantic comedy. Rated R for sex-related content. Running time: 104 min.

"I didn't know turning 30 was terminal," declares single, commitment-phobic Jasmine ("Grace of My Heart's" Illeana Douglas), thus summarizing the impetus for "Wedding Bell Blues." This first flick from director Dana Lustig is an above-average romantic comedy laden with well-delivered yuks that also has something smart to say about aging, relationships and the pressure on women to marry young. Fed up with men, Jasmine and her two roommates—Micki ("Doc Hollywood's" Julie Warner) and Tanya (supermodel/actress Paulina Porizkova, currently in "Female Perversions")—embark on a road trip to Las Vegas. Their mission: to find husbands, marry, and quickly divorce. Their fast-approaching thirtieth birthdays will be easier to stomach, they reckon, as glamorous divorcees than old maids.

"Wedding Bell Blues" owes much to a ingenious script by Annete Goliti-Gutierrez. She builds the story not only upon the protagonists' relationships with their male counterparts but also upon their relationships with each another. The benefit is a fool-proof framework from which to pull genuine laughs and character development. Lustig's direction remains focused on resolving the women's issues, and her film generates an engaging momentum; the distaff demo is likely to chuckle knowingly about such common topics as bridesmaid dresses, pregnancy tests, and men.

Also to Lustig's credit, even such seen-it-before moments as cruising the Vegas Strip seem fresh rather than cliched, and she extracts superb performances from the entire cast. Leading the pack is Douglas, who's never been saucier, with Warner and Porizkova not far behind. Each actress slips with ease into a character she clearly understands. Rounding out the ensemble is a fine supporting cast.—Ian Hodder

THE BUTTERFLY LIFTS THE CAT ★★★1/2

Starring Arjan Kindermanns, Marjolein Beumer and Rik Launspach. Directed by Willeke Van Ammelrooy. Written by Carel Donck, Sander Vos and Willeke Van Ammelrooy. Produced by Stichting De Vlinder. No stateside distributor set. Drama. Not yet rated. Running time: 113 min.

Dutch actress Willeke Van Ammelrooy, best known in America as the titular heroine of the Oscar-winning "Antonia's Line," steps behind the camera for "The Butterfly Lifts the Cat." Crammed with complexities, it's a tough assignment for a first-time director, but Van Ammelrooy meets the challenge. That's fitting, because this film is about overcoming life's unpredictable obstacles. It concerns, specifically, thirtyish David (Arjan Kindermanns) and his relationships with ex-girlfriend Linda (Marjolein Beumer) and brother Anton (Rik Launspach).

David and Linda reunite 10 years after a sudden break-up, and both have a surprise for each other: David is stricken with multiple sclerosis; Linda has an adolescent son, who wants to meet his father. Mercifully, Van Ammelrooy avoids milking audience emotions, trusting instead her skillful cast and script to unfold the drama in a wholly realistic manner. Were it not for its often wonderful cinematography, "The Butterfly Lifts the Cat" could pass as a gripping documentary about a rough period in the life of three friends. Every scene rings true.—Ian Hodder to Laura ("Wyatt Earp's" Johanna Ter Steege)—is so original and exuberant that the whole film warrants recommendation for its beginning alone. After Jan and Laura consummate their unspoken courtship, they introduce themselves, and Jan reveals, "I'm married." What follows is the mother of all on-again/off-again relationships, as the forbidden lovers grapple with a passion that neither of them understands.

Director and co-writer Heddy Honigmann reveals a wonderful intuition for complementing her characters' emotions with camera motion—variously caressing, running and staring. And it's unimaginable that Honigmann could have picked more controlled yet emotive leads than Van Sande and Ter Steege. "Goodbye" would have benefited from one less breakup and reunification, regardless of how true-to-life this drawn-out pattern is. It's a rare film, however, that can realistically portray all-consuming passion without descending into absurdity or going straight over the top.—Ian Hodder

TORONTO FILM FESTIVAL

FIRE ★★★1/2

Starring Shabana Azmi, Nandita Das and Ranjit Chowdhry. Directed and written by Deepa Mehta. Produced by Bobby Bedi and Deepa Mehta. A Zeitgeist release. Drama. Unrated. Running time: 104 min.

Deepa Mehta rebounds from her last misfire, the little-seen Jessica Tandy/Bridget Fonda starrer "Camilla," with a much better take on a friendship between two women. Set in contemporary Bombay, "Fire" is a probing and sensitive look at the continuing clash between traditional and modern Indian values, typified by the strong relationship between Radha (Shabana Azmi), an unhappily married older woman, and Sita (Nandita Das), a young and vibrant addition to the household who stirs her in ways she has not experienced before.

Unlike Mira Nair's "Kama Sutra," "Fire" is imbued with real passion and conviction. Though shot in English, it never feels stilted; Mehta's direction and plotting are pleasingly subtle. She even throws in some effective comic bits featuring Ranjit Chowdhry as a perpetually horny boarder. The other men in the film, such as Sita's faithless husband Jatin (Jaaved Jaaferi), are given their due, too. In its quiet way, "Fire" packs an emotional wallop.—Shlomo Schwartzberg

THE DELTA ★

Starring Shane Gray and Thang Chan. Directed and written by Ira Sachs. Produced by Margot Bridger. A Charlie Guidance production; no stateside distributor set. Drama. Not yet rated. Running time: 80 min.

Set in the new South, this pedestrian and amateurish drama looks at the gay life of two individuals in the Mississippi Delta. One, a white suburban teen (Shane Gray) who has a girlfriend, is given to sneaking off to pick up male hustlers. A Vietnamese man (Thang Chan) with whom he gets involved at the film's beginning falls in love with him, and the two undertake an odd, uncertain relationship that ends in tragedy.

The American South remains an underused subject of stateside film, and its gay aspects have remained almost completely untouched. But "The Delta" is such a flat, slow and uninflected movie that it undermines any provocative observations it would like to make. Shot in 16mm, with nonpros as actors (writer/director Ira Sachs met his leads in a pool hall), "The Delta" leaves no impression at all, so its interest to audiences, whether straight or gay, is likely to be negligible.—Shlomo Schwartzberg

DOG RUN ★★1/2

Starring Brian Marc, Craig DuPlessis and Lisa Ristorucci. Directed by D. Ze'ev Gilad. Written by Brian Marc and D. Ze'ev Gilad. Produced by Jeffrey Feldman, Brian Marc and D. Ze'ev Gilad. No stateside distributor set. Drama. Not yet rated. Running time: 104 min.

Stuck working in New Orleans for a drug dealer, teenagers Eddie (Brian Marc) and Miles (Craig DuPlessis) leap at the chance when their boss orders them to transport some heroin to Manhattan. Once there, they're left stranded with no place to go.

"Dog Run" is an authentic-looking movie, a warts-and-all depiction of the squatters, drug addicts and homeless kids fending for themselves on the streets of New York. But director/co-scripter D. Ze'ev Gilad is on shakier ground when he tries to dramatize the situation. As Eddie and Miles become involved with two women, drug addict Tara (Lisa Ristorucci) and college student Rachel (Elizabeth Horsburgh), the film becomes less realistic and more contrived. The relationship between Miles and Rachel is especially unbelievable, a fake "West Side Story" for the '90s. A first-time helmer, Gilad demonstrates a talent for atmosphere, but he'll need a better screenplay next time around if he expects his film to score.—Shlomo Schwartzberg

FLOATING LIFE ★★★

Starring Annette Shun Wah, Annie Yip and Anthony Wong. Directed by Clara Law. Written by Eddie L.C. Fong and Clara Law. Produced by Bridget Ikin. No stateside distributor set. Drama. Chinese-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 95 min.

An aptly titled, uneven yet emotionally affecting work that deals with areas of the immigrant experience seldom explored in contemporary films, "Floating Life" was shot mostly in Australia (where director Clara Law and her husband/co-writer, Eddie Fong, now reside). The film chronicles a Chinese family from Hong Kong that has scattered to the winds on the eve of reunification with mainland China.

Eldest daughter Yen settles in Germany with her husband and daughter; youngest sibling Bing obtains a huge house Down Under with her husband, and there the rest of the family—including a crop of teenagers—turns up (however uncomfortably) to live; oldest son Gar Ming stays in Hong Kong at the old family home awaiting his own immigration papers. Law shifts her story from house to house to explore the dislocations, tensions and longing for a sense of home. Placed in a suburb that's stuck in endless space with all that harsh light, the levels of that displacement are obvious, and it's both funny and sad, especially when contrasted with Gar Ming's loneliness in Hong Kong's teeming crowds and Yen in Germany's darker shadows.

What most makes "Floating Life" refreshing is the way it tackles the subject of emigration. Rather than making the family into victims of racist rejection at the hands of the Aussies, the film—as did Paul Mazursky's "Moscow on the Hudson"—looks deeper into a more complex type of homesickness brought on by leaving one's cultural roots behind. Law's work occasionally lapses into melodrama (as in Bing's battles with her family), but it reaches incongruently comic heights also (as when Pa confronts a kangaroo on his street).—Kevin Courrier

LONG DAY'S JOURNEY INTO NIGHT ★★★

Starring William Hutt, Martha Henry, Peter Donaldson and Tom McCamus. Directed by David Wellington. Written by Eugene O'Neill. Produced by Daniel Iron and Niv Fichman. No stateside distributor set. Drama. Not yet rated. Running time: 173 min.

Probably the greatest of all American plays, Eugene O'Neill's autobiographical Irish-American saga "Long Day's Journey Into Night" has been made into a handsome and faithful work by Canadian helmer David Wellington ("A Man in Uniform"). Based on the 1994 Stratford Theatre Festival production, Wellington has shot this "Long Day's Journey" in autumnal colors and in Panavision; meanwhile, a lonely, spacious family home itself becomes a character.

William Hutt, as miserly patriarch James Tyrone, gives a sturdy and powerful performance as a man who cloaks his despair in a haze of alcohol and blarney. As Mary, the morphine addict who opens the spiritual wounds that lay the family bare, Martha Henry is better here than she was in the stage version (though she still exhibits the kind of technical brilliance that reminds audiences they're watching a performance). Tom McCamus, as younger brother Edmund, a struggling writer who is ill with consumption, conveys his brooding and melancholic humor with true lyricism. But Peter Donaldson (as older brother Jamie, a man who has failed to live up to his father's—and his own—expectations) in the final act, when he confronts Edmund with his darkest secret, plays so inebriated that it slurs the potency of O'Neill's prose.

This take might not have the sweeping power of the only other theatrical film version, the great 1962 interpretation directed by Sidney Lumet and starring the amazing ensemble of Katharine Hepburn, Ralph Richardson, Jason Robards and Dean Stockwell. But it still stands on its own as a fine adaptation.—Kevin Courrier

CINEMA OF CD

by Ann Kwinn

Now that the marriage between Hollywood and Silicon Valley is no longer front-page news and the couple are not quite newlyweds, some behavior patterns have emerged in the relationship. In the case of CD-ROMs based on movies, studios have become much more cautious, not viewing as many titles as appropriate for the conversion. Some interactive departments have come and gone.

The way the interactive medium is being used—the approaches, models and paradigm—is narrowing. There are fewer cinematic or narrative titles, such as "Johnny Mnemonic." There are fewer adult edutainment titles like the "Braveheart" CD-ROM, which gave information about medieval Scotland and background information about the film. Instead, the studios have largely pointed their efforts toward creating true games. And most studios have given game-making back to the professionals: top performers such as Activision, 7th Level and Acclaim Entertainment. This trend is so strong that some titles, such as "Space Jam," are created for proprietary game hardware such as the Sony PlayStation or the Sega Saturn as well as for CD-ROM use.

Still, movie-based CD-ROMs haven't vanished. Following are reviews of some recent titles from the genre.

DISNEY'S ANIMATED STORYBOOK: TOY STORY ★★★★1/2

Disney Interactive and Pixar Animation Studios; Windows and Macintosh; $35-$40.

Wow. Pixar Animation Studios (whose CEO and main stockholder is Apple Computer co-founder Steve Jobs) introduced 3-D animation to animation festgoers with "Luxo," a short subject about the relationship between a high-intensity desk lamp and a rubber ball. Pixar later created the hilarious "Tin Toy," in which toys cower in the shadow of a drooling, bumbling baby who doesn't really mean to toss them around and in the end wants to play only with the packaging. And the first completely computer-generated feature film, Pixar's "Toy Story," delivered stunning images, humor and excitement.

That means the bar has been raised for children's CD-ROM titles. Yet Pixar amazes the eyes again with a wonderfully choreographed dance of light on the CRT with its Disney Animated StoryBook version of "Toy Story." On an average multimedia computer, this title seamlessly animates 3-D characters on many areas of the screen.

Designed for children ages three through nine, "Toy Story" is the fourth in Disney Interactive's Animated StoryBook series and features the talents of Annie Potts, Jim Varney, Wallace Shawn and Don Rickles, who voice the same characters they played in the movie—the toys of a six-year-old boy named Andy. But the CD-ROM also features new animation and content, especially in the form of activities.

The Broderbund Living Books format has been improved upon with integrated puzzles throughout the (toy) storybook. For example, youngsters can click on Buzz Lightyear's buttons to see what they do. Selecting Buzz at various points makes the spaceman catch Dance Fever or lift into the Dance of the Sugar Plum Fairies.

Scenes from the movie are reworked into activities. For example, in the movie's final scene, Buzz and Woody chase the moving van that is transporting Andy's family to a new home. Here, in an effort to bring the two on board, all the toys have to help. If you choose the wobbly little Fisher Price people to help, they say, "Get real. We have no arms." This product is very well done—although a title about toys can give you the sneaking suspicion that you are being marketed to!

CD SENTINELS: Woody and Buzz stand ready to entertain again, this time via Disney/Pixar's "Animated StaryBook: Toy Story."

FORREST J. ACKERMAN'S MUSEUM OF SCIENCE FICTION, HORROR AND FANTASY ★★★1/2

Marlin Software; Windows and Macintosh; $42.95.

For starters, Forrest Ackerman's apparent unconcern for what others think of him and his simultaneous desire to be known and liked make him an interesting character. Add to that his having edited 190 issues of Famous Monsters of Filmland magazine plus other fanzines, won six Hugo awards and two Gold Saturns, acted in 52 sci-fi, horror and fantasy films, and been a literary agent for more than 200 writers, including Ray Bradbury—and you have an icon.

Ackerman is known to such movie megafigures as Steven Spielberg, John Landis, George Lucas, Joe Dante and Stephen King, some of whom have put him in bit parts in their movies. A fan of wordplay, he coined the expression "sci-fi," and he can be seen on the sci-fi convention circuit, gracious to new fans and old, no matter how freakish, showing them his mummy ring—a prop from an old B&W horror flick.

Ackerman has one of the world's largest collections of sci-fi movie memorabilia, certainly risen in value since the days when Forry hung with Vincent Price and Bela Lugosi. Housed in his home, the Ackermansion, are 300,000 items, including 100,000 photos, 50,000 books, and original artwork by sci-fi artists. He's guided 25,000 fans on tours through this private showroom.

The collection is the basis for this CD-ROM program. It includes interviews, video clips, artwork, rare photos, seven full-length novels, and props and miscellany from seven decades of collecting. The four-CD set is grouped by three areas—science fiction, fantasy, and horror—and presents the material in a virtual museum something like the original. A whole room is devoted to Ackerman's fave flick, "Metropolis."

This CD and its subject seem well matched to a target audience; among the ranks of high-level computer users are many sci-fi fans. The media richness of the CD format and its common "searching through space" metaphor are much like searching a museum. Because the museum in question is a media one, cataloging the fields of comic books, novels, film, etc., multimedia is the perfect vehicle.

This product features 3-D animation and Apple's QuickTime VR (virtual reality) technology, but the real beauty the Marlin Software developers have added to the artifacts are 2-D collages surrounding them.

THE ULTIMATE JAMES BOND: AN INTERACTIVE DOSSIER ★★★1/2

MGM Interactive; Windows; $39.95 (includes "GoldenEye" vidcocassette).

This product is simple, slick, well-organized and informative. A sort of interactive version of a Bond encyclopedia, like Steven Jay Rubin's "The Complete James Bond Movie Encyclopedia," it uses video footage from the movies and hyperlinks users to textual information from basic categories in the main menu, such as Missions, Women, Allies, Villians, Q-Branch, Vehicles, and HMSS Trivia Challenge. There is some minimal animation for panache. Imposed limitations set a focused tone and purpose to this title: Access the data quickly and tastefully—just as James would like it.

The interface is a fantasy image of what one might conjure if asked to think of "spy software," and it leads to information about the characters more than the films' actors or creators. It is the proverbial "must have" for Bond fans. There is new footage of Desmond Llewelyn, the actor who played Q in almost all of the Bond movies. The actor speaks directly to the user to explain how to use the software. The Q-Branch section gives the specs of such items as an exploding gas keychain, exploding milk bottles, and a KGB panic watch (and those are all from one movie, "The Living Daylights").

The material was compiled by two Bond experts who went into the United Artists vaults to find more than 200 behind-the-scenes production stills and more than a thousand photographs. (The cover photos prove that, without a doubt, all the Bonds after Sean Connery had clefts in their chins.)

SPACE JAM ★★★

Acclaim Entertainment; Windows (also Sony PlayStation, Sega Saturn); $39.99.

Creating another basketball CD-ROM title was a good play for Acclaim Entertainment. Its NBA "Jam" series is the best-selling sports video game franchise of all time.

The Warner Bros. film, "Space Jam," stars basketball superstar Michael Jordan, who can fly through the air like a huge predatory bird, and just about any of the Looney Tunes characters one can think of: Bugs Bunny, Daffy Duck, Porky Pig, Elmer Fudd, the Tasmanian Devil, Marvin the Martian, Foghorn Leghorn, Wiley Coyote and the Roadrunner, Michigan J. Frog, Sylvester and Tweety, and Yosemite Sam. The Chicken Hawk wasn't on the court, but he might have been in the stands. It's a virtual curtain call for the entire collection of characters and feels like a stroll through a Warner Bros. store. The movie also introduces a new character, Lola Bunny, who is sexy and athletic and doesn't like to be called "Doll." This means, of course, that Bugs doesn't have to dress up in drag to advance the plot. Yet all this didn't make the movie the "license to print money" some thought the expensive film would be.

The CD-ROM version consists of a basketball game interspersed with side games and puzzles at the quarters, with names like: Space Race, Locker Room Challenge and the Trophy Room, which hearken back to the movie. On the court, you can run, pass, shoot, jump or switch in a three-on-three against either the Looney Tunes characters (The Tune Squad) or the Monstars, evil alien creatures (from the movie) who have stolen the talent of professional players. In individual play, the basketball ball pretty much always goes into the basket. One just presses the arrow key to move down the court, and then the alt key to shoot. Alternatively, one can use game peripherals such as a joypad, which is a joystick with buttons at the base, or a Gravis Grip, a pad with buttons. Like basketball itself, it's for youngsters or adults.

Before the basketball game starts, the players come onto the court with characteristic flourishes. For example, Daffy pulls out a sign from behind his back that reads, "I'm available for endorsements." As in the movie, it's hilarious to see Elmer Fudd, in shorts and headband, flying toward the baseboard with a look of murder on his face. A lumpy witch and a bespectacled granny serve an cheerleaders, leaping high with huge smiles on their faces. The audio is perfect: The sound effects and voiceover announcer are as real as in a real game.

At installation, a user has the option of installing 4, 55 or 147 MB of data onto the hard drive. The game runs fine with only a minimum installation. Many bosses will be "overwhelmed" to know that the CD also offers PC-networked play for up to six players. On those nights when the staff seems to be really motivated to work late, they may just be playing "Space Jam."

MUPPET TREASURE ISLAND ★★

Activision; Windows, Macintosh; $39.95.

This title stars the muppet (a cross between a marionette and a puppet) species made popular on "Sesame Street," a TV show big kids pretended not to be watching when their younger siblings had it on. Like Colm Meaney, who moved from one "Star Trek" series to another, Kermit the Frog was the only muppet to make the leap to "The Muppet Show," which aired on prime time with star (human) guests and a less educational mission. "Muppet Treasure Island" the movie, like the other muppet films, is based on the "Muppet Show" characters.

The "Muppet Treasure Island" CD-ROM is an example of great material in search of a treasure: an appropriate interactive model, which is never quite found. The developers were probably striving to create a title that would appeal to young kids and adolescents, like the movie did. One failing is that the game doesn't make much sense to people who did not see the movie, which explains, for example, that if a pirate receives a paper with a "black spot" on it he will be killed in the night.

Users are dropped into the Benbow Inn, where they hear a cry—"the black spot!"—without being told at the outset the goal one is to accomplish. This makes it hard for young children to figure out the program. One good feature is the constant presence of Stevenson the Parrot, who will give some help when clicked on. The muppets race around attractive, off-kilter backgrounds with multiple perspectives, like a Grandma Moses painting. The title is technically advanced, so much so that some computers may have trouble displaying all the images and synching up the sound and picture.

Thankfully, the movie's silly humor is here. Click on a portrait of a motherly type, and one hears: "Billy, did you remember to say 'thank you' after stealing the treasure map?" Some actions move the story along, while others are diversions. The format is more involved than an electronic book but is more frustrating. For example, a hint in the jewel-case booklet reads: "In order to get aboard the ship, you need to acquire the Seal of Passage from Squire Trelawney, son of the Bristol's master shipbuilder. Before the butler will let you in to see the Squire, you must be dressed in a 'Monsieur Edouard' original. In order to buy a Monsieur Edouard original, you need to earn some money. And the only way you can earn some money is by helping Pops shoot pies at pirates at Pops' Potpourri." Finding a hidden treasure sure is hard work!

SCI FI MOVIE MACHINE ★★1/2

TDC Interactive; Windows and Macintosh; $34.95.

Computer users like to be active, at least at the wrist. They don't like to watch long expository segments—or at least that is the accepted wisdom. Some developers have found success in providing material or structures that users can more freely manipulate. For example, Davidson and Associates' "Kid Works" series lets children create their own stories and draw their own pictures. A spate of music video CD-ROMs have come out on various proprietary platforms that let users assemble video clips in time to a song. And "Steven Spielberg's Director's Chair" (see our Oct. 96 issue) lets CD-ROM users piece together their own "movies."

"Sci Fi Movie Machine" is TDC Interactive's first title in its Cinemaker CD-ROM series, which also includes "Bimbo Movie Bash." The "Sci Fi Movie Machine" has an attractive interface and gives instruction, in the sci-fi theme of the program, on how to use it. (The program warns: "Online help android now activated. Click here to annihilate sequence.") Users just have to choose clips from within the "preview bay" and drop them into the "sequencer" in any desired order and then watch the assemblage.

The CD includes hundreds of digitized film snippets from actual sci-fi movies, including footage of rockets, robots, dinosaurs, aliens, scientists and spaceships. There is no limit on the length or number of movies someone can create. And, once they are strung together, they can be watched over and over again. Youngsters will probably enjoy this title, especially the feature that lets them speed up or slow down the movie, but it's likely too simplistic for adults, who won't feel they have really created something but have merely rearranged it.

7th Level and Morgan Creek Interactive; Windows; $39.99.

Ace is back. Love him or hate him, the Ace Ventura character has been transferred intact from the movies "Ace Ventura: Pet Detective" and "Ace Ventura: When Nature Calls" to a CD-ROM game, complete with a loud Hawaiian shirt, pompadour, swagger and adolescent humor. Those who love Ace have helped the Jim Carrey-starring films to gross more than $300 million worldwide. The "Ace Ventura" CBS Saturday-morning cartoon series consistently ranks high in the ratings.

Likewise, the CD-ROM "Ace Ventura" is animated, not live action. But the development company, 7th Level, is about the best in the business when it comes to creating humorous two-dimensional animation for CD-ROMs. The color, speed and quality of movement and expression of character are excellent. The voice actor is not Jim Carrey, but Michael Hall (who plays the character on the TV show) mimics Carrey's vocal style to a T.

The program does a good job of maintaining the childishly irreverent humor of the movies and keeping the action simple. To move forward, players must do such things as clicking on Ace to get a rope for climbing down a mountain or click on him for a key so that an apartment door can be unlocked. It's quite do-able for children or teenagers.

Although obnoxious, Ace has a good heart and does his best to protect the furry, four-legged and finned creatures of the earth in brand-new scenarios. One can travel to an underground Alaskan factory on Ace's monster snowmobile to solve a case of missing Huskies, or engage a deranged whalenapper in an underwater chase, swimming to avoid floating garbage. The four villains (one is named Phatteus Lardus) are all animal haters.

All told, butt-yodeling Ace and a monkey named Spike take players through three investigative cases comprising 34 complex scenarios in which one must collect items and clues to crack the case. Mazes must be navigated and puzzles solved along the way as well.

ALIVE AND KICKING ★★1/2

Starring Jason Flemyng and Anthony Sher. Directed by Nancy Meckler. Written by Martin Sherman. Produced by Martin Pope. A First Look release. Drama/romance. Rated R for some strong sexuality, and for nudity and language. Running time: 110 min. Opens 7/25 ltd.

"Indian Summer," this film's original title, is more evocative and better suited to the mood here than the more jaunty "Alive and Kicking" moniker under which the film is now being released. Despite the provocative energies of its leading couple, this story of love in the face of illness needs its sense of melancholy transience to resonate in order to affect audiences fully. Sometimes it succeeds, but at other times the deeper feelings twirl away in teasing superficiality, much in the way Jason Flemyng's character leads his life before he meets his match.

Jason Flemyng stars in First Look's "Alive and Kicking."

Both Flemyng ("Stealing Beauty") as Tonio, a glamor boy dancer, and Anthony Sher as Jack, a plain theropist, give lively, starry performances in which their indulgences are more often entertainingly surprising rather than merely showoff turns. As they try to bring the surface and interior of their couple's lives into harmony, they prove a discordant but compelling couple in a love story that's appealing in its awkward intensity.

Playwright Martin Sherman ("Bent") has created well-etched, multi-layered characters. It's easy to envision the love story of Tonio and Jack just being played out duet style on stage, without any need for the scenic backdrops that a film work demands. But the issue of AIDS, which underlies their life choices, and the milieu of the English dance world, around which the story is set, are not as fully realized as the lead roles. Also, little new terrain is covered, though both Anthony Higgins as a dying superstar and Dorothy Tutin as an addled prima donna catch their own brief spotlights with bright and touching wit.—Bridget Byrne

'TIL THERE WAS YOU ★

Starring Jeanne Tripplehorn, Dylan McDermott and Sarah Jessica Parker. Directed by Scott Winant. Written by Winnie Holzman. Produced by Penney Finkelman Cox, Tom Rosenberg and Alan Poul. A Paramount release. Romance. Rated PG-13 for sensuality, language and drug references. Running time: 113 min.

Any romantic movie that chooses to incorporate a clip of "Brief Encounter" into its storyline must be very sure about what it's doing. "'Til There Was You" is not. This attempt at a modern-day love story is a mushy and ill-formed mess, uncomfortably inept whether trying to be sentimental or satiric. Combining ideas and themes much better explored in films as diverse as Claude Lelouch's "And Now My Love" and Steve Martin's "L.A. Story," the script fails to weave together its myriad threads into anything other than a tangled lump.

A jerky plotline follows an intended couple as chance, circumstance and plot contrivance keep them apart as they grow into trendy Los Angeles adults. The characters are weakly drawn and the symbolic landscape of their lives heavy-handedly conceived. Jeanne Tripplehorn, as struggling writer Gwen, and Dylan McDermott, as aspiring architect Nick, both lack oomph, so the movie clings to other surfaces. This is a movie in which the back history is a collection of hairstyles and the future, presumably, a smoke-free zone. In between is just thirty-something delusion.—Bridget Byrne

Starring Andy Garcia, Richard Dreyfuss and Lena Olin. Directed and written by Sidney Lumet. Produced by Thom Mount and Josh Kramer. A Paramount release. Drama. Rated R for violence and language. Running time: 110 min.

Corruption, within both the police department and the legal system, has provided fertile ground for Sidney Lumet in the past; witness "Serpico," "Prince of the City" and "Verdict." With "Night Falls on Manhattan," Lumet again sets out to explore issues of personal and public responsibility, moral compromise, culpability and the nature of justice. But this time he stumbles.

This Spelling production concerns an idealistic young street cop turned Manhattan district attorney (Andy Garcia) whose moral principles are tested during an investigation into police corruption. The fact that Garcia's character goes from being a wet-behind-the-ears lawyer to DA so quickly is only one of many implausible plot points upon which the story rests. Also thrown into the mix is a romantic subplot involving a civil rights attorney (Lena Olin); not only is the romance pointless, there is zero chemistry between Garcia and Olin.

Heavy on melodrama and scenery-chewing performances (especially by Ron Liebman as a DA overseeing Garcia's fast rise), the film at least tries to tackle important issues: the collapse of traditional morality in America, the nature of justice in a corrupt world, the conflict between the greater good and the moral infractions sometimes necessary to achieve it, and the price to both the public and the individual of making those compromises.—Jean Oppenheimer

BUDDY ★★

Starring Rene Russo, Robbie Coltrane and Alan Cumming. Directed and written by Caroline Thompson. Produced by Steve Nicolaides and Fred Fuchs. A Columbia release. Comedy/drama. Rated PG for some threatening animal action. Running time: 84 min.

"Buddy" is a difficult—even painful—film to watch, which is most certainly not what the folks behind the project intended. Based on a true story, as recounted in Gertrude Linz's book, "Animals Are My Hobby," this first feature from Jim Henson Productions concerns an eccentric socialite in 1920s New York who surrounded herself with animals she raised as children.

Gertrude "Trudy" Lintz (Rene Russo, poorly served by Caroline Thompson's script) is a wealthy, generous woman whose achilles heel is that she thinks she knows what is best for everyone—including Buddy, a sickly baby gorilla she nurses to health. She attires Buddy in human clothes, forces him to walk upright, makes him sleep in a bed and generally sets out to civilize him, blind to how unhappy and lonely the growing ape is becoming and failing to recognize his child-like attachment to her.

Well-intentioned though Trudy might be, her insensitivity comes across as cruelty, and that proves an insurmountable problem in the film. Thompson, who wrote Tim Burton's "Edward Scissorhands" and "The Nightmare Before Christmas" and adapted and directed "Black Beauty," is drawn to creatures who are outsiders, which is perhaps why Buddy and fellow chimpanzees are the most developed, empathetic characters here. Scottish actor Alan Cumming is the only human to bring any depth to his role, and the normally lovable Robbie Coltrane, as Trudy's extraordinarily tolerant husband, is flat and dull. Although beautifully shot and bearing first-rate production design, this Henson effort proves to be a sad disappointment.—Jean Oppenheimer

THE LOST WORLD: JURASSIC PARK ★★★★

Starring Jeff Goldblum, Julianne Moore, Pete Postlethwaite, Arliss Howard and Richard Attenborough. Directed by Steven Spielberg. Written by David Koepp. Produced by Gerald R. Molen and Colin Wilson. A Universal release. Fantasy/adventure. Rated PG-13 for intense sci-fi terror and violence. Running time: 129 min.

After "Jaws," Steven Spielberg publicly scorned the making of sequels as a "cheap carny trick." His decision to direct the inevitable "Jurassic Park" sequel himself, rather than assigning it to another filmmaker, was partly a protection against a cheesy followup to what is the biggest global blockbuster in movie history. Spielberg amply delivers the goods with Amblin Entertainment's "The Lost World: Jurassic Park," a beautifully crafted series of nightmarish set pieces with no other goal in mind than to scare and delight the audience. If the film ultimately seems more efficient than inspired, with less emotional and visceral impact than such classic Spielberg suspensers as "Duel" and "Jaws," its popular appeal vindicates his return to escapist entertainment following "Schindler's List."

Perhaps it's a spillover effect of "Schindler's List" that makes this dinosaur movie much darker in look and feel than "Jurassic Park." "Schindler's List" cinematographer Janusz Kaminski gives "The Lost World's" jungle scenes the subtly fantastic haze of Corot paintings. Spielberg makes no attempt to replicate "Jurassic Park's" awestruck contemplation of the majesty of prehistoric beasts, concentrating instead on unrelentingly creepy and horrific images of genetic engineering gone awry.

LOST WORLDS: The 1925 silent version of Arthur Conan Doyle's tale (above), and Steven Spielberg's latest via Michael Crichton.

The unruly dinosaurs on Site B, the island where the beasts of Jurassic Park were bred, have far more interaction with the human characters than did their predecessors. Dinosaur creators Dennis Muren, Stan Winston and Michael Lantieri outdo themselves with astonishingly believable creatures moving and breathing with utter physical dexterity and abandon.

The dialogue and structure by screenwriter David Koepp ("Mission: Impossible") substantially improve on Michael Crichton's dull and perfunctory source novel. But, with the exception of the edgily heroic Malcolm (a returning Jeff Goldblum) and an enigmatic big-game hunter ("Dragonheart's" Pete Postlethwaite), the characterizations remain stubbornly two-dimensional. The film occasionally exhibits a winning strain of self-satire, as in Malcolm's running stream of ironic asides and an uproarious finale in San Diego that plays like a spoof of a 1950s monster movie.—Joseph McBride

ADDICTED TO LOVE ★★★

Starring Matthew Broderick, Meg Ryan, Tcheky Karyo and Kelly Preston. Directed by Griffin Dunne. Written by Robert Gordon. Produced by Jeffrey Silver and Bobby Newmyer. A Warner Bros. release. Romantic comedy. Rated R for sexual content. Running time: 100 min.

Revenge is Sweet and Hell Hath No Fury Like a Woman Scorned are popular cinematic themes these days. (See "The First Wives Club" and "Waiting to Exhale" for other recent movies that would be apt to elicit an exuberant cry of "you go, girl!" from some of the more overenthusiastic audience members.) "Addicted to Love's" Maggie (Meg Ryan), the former fiancee of an exploitive, arrogant French waiter-turned-restaurateur named Anton ("La Femme Nikita's" Tcheky Karyo), adds another colorfully vengeful archetype to film's pantheon of jilted Jills. And Matthew Broderick plays simpy Sam, whose love of his life, Laura ("Jerry Maguire's" Kelly Preston), left him for Maggie's Anton.

Sam moves into an abandoned apartment next door to the paramours' residence to spy. On her quest to decimate her ex, the intimidating Maggie moves into Sam's spy hovel against his wishes but soon persuades him to join her in her devious plot to break up the happy couple. Wacky schemes ensue, and Sam and Maggie begin to bond while reveling in conspiratorial glee. Eventually, though, they must come to terms with the fact that what they thought would make them happy doesn't seem to be doing so.

Ryan takes a refreshing 90-degree turn from her usual screen persona as the aggressive yet cool, eclectically garbed, tough-as-nails Maggie (though there's sensitivity beneath), while Broderick's perennial puppy-dog appeal and subtle sardonic delivery fit him perfectly into the role of Sam. And Karyo as Anton delves with relish into his role as an egomaniacal dictator-type who, through ascendingly outrageous humiliations, is reduced to being a painfully pathetic loser. Although ultimately predictable and in need of a wider array of inventive revenges, "Addicted to Love" is fun, spirited and frequently clever.—Christine James

LA PROMESSE ★★★★

Starring Jeremie Renier, Olivier Gourmet and Assta Ouedraogo. Directed and written by Jean-Pierre Dardenne and Luc Dardenne. Produced by Luc Dardenne and Hassen Daldoul. A New Yorker release. Drama. French-language; English subtitles. Unrated. Running time: 93 min.

For more than 20 years, Belgian brothers Luc and Jean-Pierre Dardenne have been making documentaries together. Their subject matter has usually centered on the Leftist worker movements of the 1960s, their preference a directorial style admittedly "theatrical" and subjective. Now, moving away from the constraints of "reality, to which we were accountable," the duo has turned to fiction features. With "La Promesse," their third, they've created a work of great emotional depth and impact that ironically draws much of its power from low-key, naturalistic performances captured with a shooting style more often associated with traditional documentary making.

Set in the post-industrial limbo of a dead factory town, "La Promesse" follows 15-year-old Igor, a boy learning how to be a small-time hustler from his father Roger. Together they toil in the town's only growth industry: the exploitation of illegal immigrants by providing them with false papers, flophouses and off-the-books construction work. Igor's moral awakening comes with a covered-up accidental death of an African illegal. Igor must either betray his father or the promise he made to the dying man to look after his wife and infant.

The Dardennes have written a compelling, believable script and have drawn excellent performances from mostly unknown or inexperienced actors. But the truly wonderful thing about "La Promesse" is how the film's style and structure seem spontaneous, almost casual, obscuring all the thought and work necessary to achieve that effect. The camera is always in just the right place, with many scenes shot in continuous handheld takes that move with and pan between actors in place of cutting. And the brothers have the courage to allow emotionally significant events to transpire in wide unbroken shots, often with a major character's back to camera. This type of approach could easily seem gimmicky in less skillful hands, but here it's an integral part of a remarkable achievement.—Alex Albanese

Starring Billy Crudup and Adrienne Shelley. Directed by Chris Kentis. Written by Laura Lau and Chris Kentis. Produced by Laura Lau. A Castle Hill release. Drama. Unrated. Running time: 96 min.

A worthless effort displaying egotism rather than talent, "Grind" is indeed a grind—torpid, bland, lifeless and hollow. Its worst aspect is the pretentious sensibility of writer/director Chris Kentis, who makes labored attempts to integrate existential elements in a simple film noir character study.

Billy Crudup ("Sleepers") tries mightily to overcome the colorless role the script provides him, and he nearly succeeds. He plays an ex-con who moves in with his older brother (a one-note Paul Schulze) after being released from prison. Predictably, the parolee falls for his brother's wife (a pretty but vapid Adrienne Shelley) as he toils in a monotonous factory job when he's not drag racing. He gets into even more trouble when he partners with his brother and a crooked boss in a car insurance scam that goes awry.

Already cursory narrative exposition is further damaged by a lack of character development and motivation and by a lack of chemistry between Crudup and Shelley. Kentis' helming is long on amateurish staging and slack pacing—and long on pauses that are supposed to be pregnant with meaning. His idea of alienation and ennui is to have the actors stare into space or to have scenes suddenly fade out, condemnably faux artistic daring.—Dale Winogura

RUDYARD KIPLING'S THE SECOND JUNGLE BOOK: MOWGLI & BALOO ★

Starring Jamie Williams, Bill Campbell and Roddy McDowall. Directed by Duncan McLachlan. Written by Bayard Johnson and Matthew Horton. Produced by Raju Patel. A TriStar release. Adventure. Rated PG for some mild adventure violence and brief mild language. Running time: 90 min.

In the past, Disney has released two versions of the Rudyard Kipling classic "Jungle Book." The first was animated, the latter live-action. But this live-action film is really more a prequel to the animated work, albeit without songs and talking animals.

Set in the 1890s, this latest Kipling reworking opens with Mowgli (newcomer Jamie Williams) as a 10-year-old wild boy living with his wildlife family in the jungles of India. In a pitiful performance, Roddy McDowall ("Planet of the Apes") takes the pre-King Louie throne as King Murphy. Mowgli's jungle teacher, Baloo the bear, and his protector, Bagheera the panther, are back, but the filmmakers seem to overlook the fact that, as characters in a prequel, they need introduction. A supposition that audiences will already be familiar with Mowgli & co., given that this film is aimed at single-digit ages, is probably unwarranted.

A simple plotline has two monkeys trying to kidnap Mowgli and bring him back to their king. A circus talent scout ("The Rocketeer's" Bill Campbell) also wants Mowgli, but the scout's quest requires the aid of Mowgli's uncle, who has his own hidden agenda. None of this has any dramatic zest; if not for the bumbling antics of the monkeys, there would be no relief from a long and lingering boredom the film endengers. Any adults along to accompany the kids will be put off by the film's low-budget low-techery, in which the closeups of actors and animals are superimposed or spliced together.—Dwayne E. Leslie

THE FIFTH ELEMENT ★★★

Starring Bruce Willis, Gary Oldman, Ian Holm, Milla Jovovich and Chris Tucker. Directed by Luc Besson. Written by Luc Besson and Robert Mark Kamen. Produced by Patrice Ledoux. A Columbia release. SF. Rated PG-13 for intense sci-fi violence, some sexuality and brief nudity. Running time: 125 min.

In his most recent films—"La Femme Nikita," "The Professional" and now "The Fifth Element"—an index of filmmaker Luc Besson's artistic success has been the amount of romantic frisson generated by his story. In his newest, in which a 23rd century taxi driver (Bruce Willis) must protect a young/old gamine (Milla Jovovich) who as the eternal and DNA-reincarnated perfection of life is the world's only hope against an evil force, that success is more modest. Fortunately, a concomitant success index—of Besson's ability to dazzle audiences with action pyrotechnics—has not lessened.

FARE "FIFTH": Luc Besson transports audiences to a 23rd-century Manhattan.

"The Fifth Element" affords Besson a galactic stage—and a fivefold increase in budget (French production company Gaumont prices it at $80 million, Gaul's most expensive cinema effort ever)—and with it Besson creates an especially "movable" feast. Even when the film is idling, the design team led by Dan Weil and costumer Jean-Paul Gaultier ("The City of Lost Children") make sure plenty is going on visually.

As with most SF, the story is high-school simple. (Besson conceived the idea when he was 16.) Perhaps it's the intervening 22 years that allowed Besson time for elaboration. So wonderfully overwrought are the heavy-metal kinetics of the narrative presentation that the audience is unlikely to worry much about whether the story is cosmologically cohesive, or even logical. That's fortunate, for the answers are no.

As the antihero, Bruce Willis is much less challenged here than in the similar-genre "12 Monkeys," but his cocky smirk is all that is required. More important to the success of "The Fifth Element" than any performer, however, is composer Eric Serra.

FOUR MILLION HOUSEGUESTS ★★★1/2

Starring Charlotte Sullivan and C. David Johnson. Voice work by James Garner. Directed by Paul Cox. Produced by Mitey Cinema, Sally Dundas, Barbara Kerr and Lorne Orleans. An Imax Corp. release. Documentary/drama. Unrated. Running time: 45 min. Format: IMAX 3-D.

JUMPIN' JIMINY: A leaping spider (viewed via electron microscope) in IMAX's "Four Million Houseguests."

Four million houseguests sounds like the kind of intrusion that could occur before a wedding or during a natural disaster. In this case, it's a new IMAX 3-D offering.

This kind of movie can deliver at least two things: eye strain and hat hair. Its images are made three-dimensional via a relatively new technique: An infrared light is sent from 36 transmitters at the top of the giant screen to sensors on audience members' 3-D glasses. This sets off the "opening" and "closing" of left and then right virtual shutters in the glasses. The shutter effect is created by liquid crystal lenses that become black and clear. This, of course, all happens very quickly: 95 times per second.

At a recent California screening at the Edwards IMAX 3-D Theatre at its Irvine 21 Megaplex, director Paul Cox was on hand to answer the important questions of children in the audience, such as, "Where did you get all that stuff?"

"All that stuff" includes time-lapse photography of molding fruit, Schlieren photography revealing patterns of heat in the air, reptiles and insects changing color, and the star of the show: fantastic high (up to 40,000x) magnification, high-contrast black-and-white images from an electron microscope that made moths and spiders look like film noir actors. But the film conveys a great sense of wonder and whimsy. Through the use of high-tech microscopes and low-tech mechanical toys, it encourages children and adolescents to explore. Cox reminds that "3-D goes in, not just out. It embraces you, brings you in."

This movie deserves a tremendous kudos for its heavy use of synch sound and an emphasis on character over scenery. The director describes it as "a small film on a very large screen." The tone is purposeful, the movement unhurried. The movie's personae are calm and caring. Contrasting his characters with others, Cox states, "So many people in films are not the kind of people I would like to spend my life with." This is true enough. You just wish that one of these nice people would toss you an aspirin.—Ann Kwinn

MEXICO ★★★

Narrated by Martin Sheen (in English) and Enrique Rocha (in Spanish). Directed and produced by Lorena M. Parlee. Written by Carlos Fuentes, Carlos Blanco Aguinaga and Lorena M. Parlee. A Sol films production. Documentary. Unrated. Running time: 43 min. Format: IMAX.

Vivid and fast-moving, "Mexico" is a colorful montage exploding with color, music and legend. From the tall, futuristic skyscrapers in its modern cities to the 3,000-year-old ruins of its ancient civilizations, "Mexico" weaves together the country's many diverse cultural aspects in presenting an elaborate 70mm mosaic. It was selected for Oscar consideration in 1995, and it was the first IMAX film chosen to screen at the annual Montreal fest.

Technically, the film is a visual masterpiece: Award-winning documentary producer/director Lorena M. Parlee (who made Showscan's "Concerto for the Earth" and the Emmy- and CINE Golden Eagle-winning documentary "Ballad of an Unsung Hero") has assembled an impressive, internationally recognized team of feature and documentary filmmakers. Three cinematographers contribute bold shots—veteran IMAX DP David Douglas ("Blue Planet," "Rolling Stones: At the Max"), Oscar winner Haskell Wexler ("One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest," "Bound for Glory") and Ariel-winning Mexican cinematographer Alex Phillips ("Evita," "Murphy's Law")—and James Neihouse provides beautiful, sweeping aerial photography. To that, composer Daniel Valdez ("La Bamba," "Zoot Suit") adds an original score of music integrating ancient rhythms with modern life sounds. Actor Martin Sheen provides a poetic recitation of Mexican novelist Carlos Fuentes' inspiring text.

The result: "Mexico" is a gorgeous film to watch. For those unfamiliar with the country's sights, however, it falls short by failing to identify many locations it fleetingly visits. In creating an aura of mystique about the country, "Mexico" has inadvertently contributed to keeping it in the dark. With the simple addition of titles, this film could be a useful vehicle in promoting the many resources that Mexico has to offer.—Pat Kramer

His music here—as always, rather like assembly-line machinery come to life after hours and riffing the night away—is so integral to the progression of each scene that one could imagine the script and the score being written at the same time, note after word, note after word. As for Besson, the talented Frenchman here stripmines rather than excavates his usual dark concerns. In "The Fifth Element," the blackest he gets is beige.—Kim Williamson

FATHERS' DAY ★★1/2

Starring Robin Williams, Billy Crystal, Charlie Hofheimer, Julia Louis-Dreyfus and Nastassja Kinski. Directed by Ivan Reitman. Written by Lowell Ganz and Babaloo Mandel. Produced by Joel Silver and Ivan Reitman. A Warner Bros. release. Comedy. Rated PG-13 for some sex-related humor and drug references. Running time: 101 min.

This farcical comedy, based on the French film "Les Comperes," is really just a set-up for two star comedians—"The Birdcage's" Robin Williams and "Forget Paris'" Billy Crystal—to riff and roll off each other while they steer moviegoers through a simple story about two very different men on the road together searching for a teenage runaway, Scott ("Boys'" Charlie Hofheimer), who one of them might or might not have sired 17 years earlier.

This is not the successful translation that "The Birdcage" (based on French film "La Cage aux Folles") was for Williams. "Fathers' Day" lacks the unique and classy mix of hilarious physical comedy churned with charmingly emotional sentiment. Williams and Crystal are funny, but the sheer nature of their personalities overwhelms this mild-mannered movie, and neither ever completely settle into his role.

Director Ivan Reitman ("Junior") gets sidetracked by his stars and forgets to make the story believable, real or understandable. Nastassja Kinski ("Faraway, So Close!") is wasted in an inexplicable role as Collette, the former amour who sets the wheels in motion. Apparently, this mom is able to track down two long-lost lovers and set them on the trail of Scott, but she's completely incapable of even trying to find her son on her own; that's some kind of maternal parenting. No wonder "Fathers' Day" opened on Mother's Day.—Susan Lambert

BREAKDOWN ★★★1/2

Starring Kurt Russell, J.T. Walsh and Kathleen Quinlan. Directed by Jonathan Mostow. Written by Jonathan Mostow and Sam Montgomery. Produced by Martha De Laurentiis and Dino De Laurentiis. A Paramount release. Thriller. Rated R for strong violence and terror, and for language. Running time: 95 min.

The gutsy, cathartic "Breakdown" mercifully avoids the smug, arch quirkiness of such pseudo-thrillers as "Fargo" and "Lost Highway." As did such makers of classic "B" movies of the 1950s like Phil Karlson and Don Siegel, writer/director Jonathan

Mostow builds dramatic intensity and visceral suspense that plugs into contemporary paranoia over personal isolation and victimization. Allowing a bare minimum of genre hokum, he creates a nightmarish reality that grips even as it chills.

In perhaps his finest performance yet, Kurt Russell keenly expresses a range of emotion and involvement as Jeff Taylor, a caring husband driving through the American Southwest desert with his wife Amy (an assured turn by Kathleen Quinlan) one hot day. When their car suffers a breakdown miles from nowhere, a kind-seeming truck driver, Red Barr ("Sling Blade's" J.T. Walsh), offers to take Amy to the nearest diner so she can call for a tow. After they leave, Jeff manages to start the car again and drives to the diner, yet on arrival his wife is nowhere to be found. Found on the road ahead, Red denies ever seeing her.

That's but the beginning of a cataclysmic series of ingeniously integrated plot twists. Aided by co-writer Sam Montgomery, Mostow maintains tension and terror within the banal yet bizarre scenario. Even though the film uses a conventional story structure, and some later contrivances are a bit too neat to believe, Mostow's direction delivers every action setpiece and startling shock with finesse.—Dale Winogura

AUSTIN POWERS: INTERNATIONAL MAN OF MYSTERY ★★★

Starring Mike Myers and Elizabeth Hurley. Directed by Jay Roach. Written by Mike Myers. Produced by Suzanne Todd, Demi Moore, Jennifer Todd and Mike Myers. A New Line release. Comedy. Rated PG-13 for nudity, sex-related dialogue and humor. Running time: 89 min.

Skewering Bond films and '60s sensibilities seemed like the perfect construct for the talented and oft-anglophilic comic actor/scripter Mike Myers ("Wayne's World"). The high-energy film opens three decades ago, with Myers decked out as the ostentatiously garbed Austin Powers, a hipster superspy. Living out the sort of scene that exists only in musical films of the flower-power era, Powers and the youths of London spontaneously engage in a groovy dance number. This deliciously over-the-top send-up promises a high level of hilarity.

What follows falls short of that mark. The story: Dr. Evil (also Myers) escapes capture by having himself cryogenically frozen and shot into space; our champion altruistically has himself frozen as well, to protect a future generation from the villain's tyranny. Thirty years later, Evil returns, plotting to steal a nuclear weapon and hold the world hostage.

For all of Myers' exuberance, masterful cheek and funny delivery of outdated vernacular, his writing just isn't up to the possibilities. Elizabeth Hurley ("Dangerous Ground") is cringingly unappealing as Myers' sidekick Vanessa; and Mimi Rogers as Powers' former partner (now Vanessa's mother) might look great in a leather Emma Peel bodysuit, but she can't maintain the English accent even for the few lines she has. The movie also doesn't go far enough

A NIGHT TO REMEMBER

[Because it looks unlikely James Cameron's "Titanic" will sail this summer, we thought we'd at least bring our readers a look at a four-decade-old retelling of the sea disaster itself then four decades past. In February 1959, Rank brought Walter Lord's book to the big screen memorably with "A Night to Remember." Notably, exhibitors were already worrying about another see disaster: TV.]

One of the greatest catastrophes of modern times—the sinking of the "unsinkable" Titanic after it struck an iceberg in the Atlantic in 1912—has been superbly recreated on film in almost documentary fashion by the Rank Organization. If heavily exploited, this two-hour feature should do fine business, particularly in key cities. Although Walter Lord's best-seller was the basis for an outstanding live TV show, plus a live repeat, a few seasons ago, Rank producer William MacQuitty maintains that these merely serve as trailers for this far more complete and frighteningly realistic film. After 40-odd years, this astonishing tale still has tremendous impact, especially for patrons who remember or had read or heard about the events of that awful night. The picture is splendidly directed by Roy Baker, and Eric Ambler's screenplay evenly divides the screen footage between the nautical side of the disaster and the human angle. The technical credits, including the sharp black-and-white photography and the special effects, could scarcely be surpassed. Kenneth More, who plays the heroic second officer, is the best-known player, but Laurence Naismith (as the Titanic's captain), Michael Goodliffe, Anthony Bushell and John Merivale all makes their scenes count. Frank Lawton and Harriette Johns co-star.

EXPLOITIPS

For local engagements, advertise for Titanic survivors, who could be honored guests and give interviews about that tragic night. Bookshops will cooperate with window displays of Walter Lord's best-seller, and fashion shops might display ladies' styles of that era along with copy for the picture. Kenneth More starred in "Genevieve" and "Doctor in the House" and is in the forthcoming "The Sheriff of Fractured Jaw."

with its fish-out-of-water time-warp mayhem, and though there are many hilarious moments (especially those that parody the cheesier aspects of '60s spy flicks) just as many miss the mark.—Christine James

WARRIORS OF VIRTUE ★★★

Starring Angus Macfadyen, Mario Yedidia, Marley Shelton and Chao-Li Chi. Directed by Ronny Yu. Written by Michael Vickerman and Hugh Kelley. Produced by Dennis Law, Ronald Law, Christopher Law, Jeremy Law and Patricia Ruben. An MGM release. Fantasy. Rated PG for fantasy action violence and some language. Running time: 102 min.

Essentially a cross between "The Neverending Story" and "Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles," "Warriors of Virtue" could be the most impressive Hollywood debut yet for a Hong Kong director, although lackluster writing and a needlessly muddled storyline somewhat tarnish the effort. Talented newcomer Mario Yedidia stars as Ryan, a standard-issue misfit adolescent whose fertile imagination propels him into a mystical world of martial arts and magic known only as the land of Tao. The once tranquil paradise, however, is threatened by an evil tyrant named Komodo (Angus Macfadyen) who supports his power by draining Tao's Lifesprings to mine an element called Zubrium. Only one Lifespring remains, just outside Komodo's reach and guarded by the amazing Warriors of Virtue, aka Roo-Warriors. Nonetheless, the balance of power in Tao lies neither with the Roo-Warriors or Komodo, but with Ryan.

Skillfully blending popular motifs from both Hong Kong and Hollywood fantasy films, director Ronny Yu ("The Bride With White Hair") and his mostly Hong Kong crew lend "Warriors of Virtue" an exquisite look and feel. Expert martial arts action in the best Hong Kong tradition and first-rate Hollywood special effects and makeup work together to create a magical adventure. Although the Warriors themselves lack the strong personality traits and humor of the Ninja Turtles, they make for more compelling onscreen characters, helping to divert attention from a surprisingly amateurish and cliched script. Occasional lapses into overly technical Chinese philosophical jargon, though distracting, are forgivable in view of the overall theme.—Wade Major

ROMY AND MICHELE'S HIGH SCHOOL REUNION ★★★★

Starring Mira Sorvino, Lisa Kudrow, Janeane Garofalo and Alan Cumming. Directed by David Mirkin. Written by Robin Schiff. Produced by Laurence Mark. A Buena Vista release. Comedy. Rated R for language. Running time: 91 min.

Buena Vista's second high school reunion film in as many weeks, "Romy and Michele" is just as charming and quirky as "Grosse Pointe Blank," with a lighter yet equally witty script. Fun and funny are the adjectives that characterize the mood of the film (based on the stage work "The Ladies' Room," adapted by the playwright, Robin Schiff), with hilariously winsome performances by Mira Sorvino and Lisa Kudrow as the titular dimwit duet. Sorvino's talent for amusingly odd vocal inflections (which helped get her that Oscar for "Mighty Aphrodite") is key to Romy's Valley Girl appeal; Kudrow's Michele may be "Friends'" Phoebe redux, but it works well in this tale of two nonconformist but slackerly misfits who fabricate glamorous lives to impress their former school nemeses.

"Romy and Michele's High School Reunion" is replete with audiovisual delights; with our heroines' outrageous fashion sense and a soundtrack jam-packed with '80s hits, the film captures much of the glamor and glitter indigenous to Me Generation-era offspring. Yet, in addition to bubbly baubles, there are some real gems in the script, and in the performances as well. With clever flashbacks and wacky dream sequences, there's never a lag in the movie's humor or its pace.

If the film wants anything, it's probably more allusions to the last decade to sate the nostalgia of the target audience; more investigation into how everyone else's lives turned out; and more inventiveness regarding payback and karma.—Christine James

UNFORGOTTEN ★★★★

Narrated by Danny Aiello. Directed by Jack Fisher. Written by Stuart Warmflash. Produced by Danny Fisher. A Castle Hill release. Documentary. Unrated. Run time: 57 min.

A generation ago, before Special Olympics and community group homes, huge state-run institutions were society's way to care for, and deal with, the mentally retarded. In the massive budget-cutting of the late 1960s, one of those places—Willowbrook State School on Staten Island—had slipped into such a state of crisis that a staff doctor secretly gave a young local reporter named Geraldo Rivera a key. The images of human deprivation and suffering he broadcast on WABC News in 1972 caused such a shocked outcry that the Willowbrook facility was eventually closed, a federal court mandating the end of such institutional care.

Those horrible images are shown again in this documentary, subtitled "Twenty-Five Years After Willowbrook." It's a powerful, unflinching work, easily one of the most important films of the year. Following up on several Willowbrook survivors and their families, the film's most heartbreaking moments aren't the archival scenes; they are interviews with parents who thought they were doing the right thing, and siblings who grew up ashamed.

Despite the heaviness of subject, the film ultimately offers a good deal of hope, showing the day-to-day lives of three former residents who now live in group homes, two with a great deal of family contact. The focus is on how far they and we have come; but the considerable personal and logistical difficulties inherent in helping provide the severely disabled dignified lives is not glossed over.—Alex Albanese

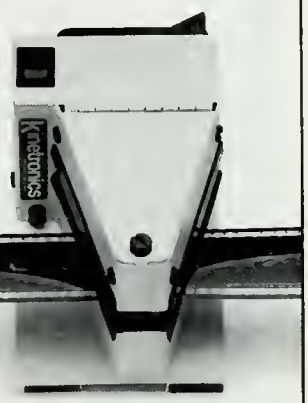
RIDING THE RAILS ★★★★

Directed, written and produced by Michael Uys and Lexy Lovell. An Artistic License release. Documentary. Unrated. Running time: 72 min.

Hobo life during the Depression is at once romanticized and deglamorized in this fine, moving documentary that fluidly combines tough nostalgia with understated social consciousness. The obviously devoted filmmakers, Michael Uys and Lexy Lovell, expertly weave together threads—interviews with survivors, newsreel footage, archival stills and folks songs—into a loving cinematic tapestry.

The hardship and loneliness of living on trains among scores of fellow bums is strongly counterpointed by the lust for adventure and escape that these people express so fondly. The usage of a clip from William Wellman's good, little-seen 1933 drama, "Wild Boys of the Road," effectively illustrates how the movies can inspire young people's life decisions. Political causes are presented as just one aspect, because the film's focus is on humanity struggling to survive at a time when that was all there was to live for. It's a rare experience and treasure, beautifully shot in 16mm.—Dale Winogura

BOYS LIFE 2 ★★



Starring Vincent D'Onofrio, Eileen Brennan, Mary Beth Hurt and Brett Barsky. A Strand release. Anthology. Unrated. Running time: 74 min.

A collection of four shorts with gay themes, "Boys Life 2" provides a wildly uneven cinematic mix. Nickolas Perry's "Must Be the Music" is a vapid story of boy meets boy at an under-age club; it has less plot and depth than most 30-second TV commercials. Tom DeCerchio's "Nunzio's Second Cousin" is a heavy-handed and utterly unfunny "comedy with a message" that unintentionally pits Eileen Brennan against Vincent D'Onofrio in a bad acting contest. It ends in a draw, each actor having bit off more scenery than he could chew.

More successful are Peggy Rajski's "Trevor," a bouncy comic short about a junior-high school student that basically comes off as a gay episode of TV's "The Wonder Years," and Mark Christopher's "Alkali, Iowa," the most thoughtful, interesting and formally inventive of the four. Focusing on a young man's search for the truth about his missing father, and himself, Christopher gets mostly first-rate cast performances and creates a good sense of time and place with low-key yet stylish directorial touches.—Alex Albanese

FARE GAMES ★★1/2

Starring Russell Stewart and Eddie Estefan. Directed and written by Brian O'Hara. Produced by Isaac Agami. An Agami production; no distributor set. Drama. Not yet rated. Running time: 90 min.

A film about New York cabbies featuring nat ane but two older-man/younger-woman relationships sounds unappealing, but "Fare Games" is an inoffensive enough little indie. In fact, if it were less tasteful and well-meaning, it might be a mare interesting movie.

The premise is simple enough: Buddies Martin (Eddie Estefan) and Jimmy (Russell Stewart) both fall for fares—married Martin for a seductive college student (Marina Morgan) and Jimmy for a topless dancer with a heart of gold (Elizabeth Curtain). This seems contrived, ta say the least, but Estefan and Stewart bring something extra to their roles that makes them believable. Morgan and Curtain are alsa appealing, but their roles aren't written with the same plausibility.—Cathy Thompson-Georges

THE REAL THING ★★

Starring James Russo, Pat Gallagher, Dave Buzzotta, Emily Lloyd and Jeremy Piven. Directed by James Merendino. Produced by Kurt Mac Carley. A Windy City release. Thriller. Unrated. Running time: 89 min.

Designed to be a stylish thriller, this LLP production borrows from "Pulp Fiction" and "El Mariachi"—combining excessive bloodshed and black humor—to try to make its point. Unlike its creative progenitors, the latest by James Merendino ("The Upstairs Neighbor") never reaches even those dramatic heights, despite an interesting story-line about losers who band together to pull off a New Years Eve robbery.

James Russo ("Dannie Brasco") is Rupert Little, a screw-up factory worker who is fired by his boss (Gary Busey). With his younger brother in desperate need of a liver transplant, Little draws together a tag-team of misfits for a one-time, large-scale robbery. At the same time, petty thief Dexter (Pat Gallagher) by chance is scheming to rob the same club sa as to prove that he is "the real thing." The two forces collide at the scene of the crime, wrecking each ather's effort to run off with the dough. In the end, everyone loses—including the audience—with this bleak, uninspired drama.—Pat Kramer

AMAZON WARRIOR (no stars)

Starring J.J. Rodgers, Jimmy Jerman, Al Spencer, Katarina Facchino and Raymond Storti. Directed by Dennis Devine. Written by Steve Jarvis. Produced by Raymond Storti. A Scarborough Films production; no distributor set. Melodrama. Not yet rated. Run time: 77 min.

This movie reportedly was made for $4,000, and when you watch it you can't help wondering, "Where did all the money go?" Strictly bottom-of-the-barrel filmmaking in every respect, this futuristic yarn featuring battling babes in leather-and-fur bikinis would be very lucky to receive a home video release. At least there are plenty of cheesecake poses to slap on the box.

J.J. Rodgers, the titular "Angel of Death," is the last survivor of a ferocious tribe of virgin mankillers, fighting to stay alive against mole marauders. Even though civilization has been obliterated in the obligatory nuclear war (one laughably hokey special-effects shot of a melting downtown Los Angeles), Rodgers' Tara keeps stocked with strawberry-blonde hair dye, although not enough to hide her black roots.

An interminable 77-minute running time is filled with absurdly choreographed fight scenes between Tara and grunting, hairy musclemen sporting costumes from army surplus. Flashbacks show Tara's mother (Katarina Facchino) frolicking topless before being slain by a bad guy (Raymond Storti, also the movie's producer). The acting level makes one hope for the cast's sake that at least some appear under assumed names. Director Dennis Devine makes Ed Wood seem like David Lean.—Joseph McBride

Compiled by BOXOFFICE MAGAZINE. Numbers for Boxoffice Gross represent total domestic boxoffice grosses to the nearest $100,000; + signs indicate that films remain in theatrical release. Number of Screens indicates the maximum number of screens in widest, simultaneous release. Entries in the Theatrical/Video Distributor column list two names when the video releasing company is different from (or releases through a subsidiary different from) the theatrical distributor. Exact day-and-date specific entries for Home Video Release are confirmed; in all other cases, the month indicated for a release is forecast by the editors of BOXOFFICE. BOXOFFICE is not liable for errors or omissions in the chart.

MO' MONEY FOR THE MOVIES

The first quarter profits for 1997 are in and the results, with the exception of Viacom, look good across the board, making it official that this was one banner first quarter for the movies. Sony Corp. increased revenues more than 1,000 percent over last year's disappointing first quarter returns, posting $99.5 million in profit, thanks to strong boxoffice from "Jerry Maguire," "Anaconda" and "The Fifth Element." Sony Pictures Releasing continues to look strong with the upcoming "Men In Black," "My Best Friend's Wedding" and "Air Force One." News Corp.'s profits were up 38 percent for the quarter ending March 31 with $291 million profit, which is credited to the boxoffice success of subsidiary 20th Century Fox's reissue of the "Star Wars" trilogy.

It was the weakest quarter for the Walt Disney Company, who still exceeded many analysts' estimates and rose 63 percent over last year's first quarter results to earn $333 million in profit, with the help of "Ransom," subsidiary Miramax's "The English Patient" and the home video release of "Toy Story." Time Warner Inc. posted $35 million in profit despite its heavy debt. Viacom Inc. showed a net loss of $18.7 million, brought down by the Blockbuster Entertainment unit and a less than blockbuster performance from Paramount, which showed a cash flow decline of 25 percent. Seagram Co.'s corporate earnings for the quarter more than doubled, posting $27 million in profits despite the fact that Universal's hit "Liar, Liar" was released too late in the quarter to help, though it will certainly boost next quarter's profits.

Among exhibitors, first quarter profits were well up from last year which is due, insiders say, to the industry becoming a 12-month business instead of a seasonal one. Regal Cinemas Inc. posted a $8.5 million profit, up 85 percent from last year. AMC Entertainment Inc.'s earnings were up 17 percent to $8.2 million. Cineplex Odeon Corp. showed $2.1 million profits against last year's $7.2 million in losses. Cinemark USA Inc.'s first quarter profits more than doubled from last year's $2.5 million up to $5.1 million, thanks in part to the addition of just over 220 screens added last year.

GIANT-SCREEN GIANTS SETTLE OUT OF COURT

Large-format companies, Imax and Showscan ceased rattling sabers at each other in May when they agreed to settled all litigation between them, one month before the first lawsuit was scheduled to begin. The settlement, which remains undisclosed, is not expected to have a financial effect on either company. The string of lawsuits first began in February 1996 when Imax filed suit against Showscan, charging copyright infringement over similarities between Showscan's Showmax and Imax's own large-format camera and projection systems.

Showscan, in turn, filed their own complaint against Imax for violation of Federal anti-trust laws. Then again this February, Showscan filed suit in U.S. District Court, seeking to have the trademark of Imax Corp. canceled because "Imax" had become a generic term. Showscan's newly appointed CEO, Dennis Pope, was said to be instrumental in negotiating the settlement between the two large-format companies.

POLYGRAM'S GAME FOR A NEW DISTRIBUTION COMPANY

They've been working on the move for years, but finally, Polygram Filmed Entertainment unveiled a new film distribution company, Polygram Filmed Entertainment Distribution, that would work alongside PFE's Gramercy Pictures to release motion pictures. Andy Fogelson was named president of the new unit by PFE president Michael Kuhn. William Soady has been named president of distribution and Peter Graves comes in as president of marketing. Kuhn looks for Polygram's distribution entity to emulate the success of such distribution companies as Miramax or October.

Polygram already distributes its own films in foreign markets, including France, Australia and Canada. Company sources say the $900 million in annual revenues from its 400-title film library should maintain more than enough financial strength to carry a domestic distribution division, but industry insiders say it would take several years of releasing 10-12 wide release pictures before the new distributor would have a shot at the majors. Gramercy Pictures, which released last year's "Fargo," will continue under president Russell Schwartz as an autonomous entity. The first release for Polygram Distribution will be "The Game," a David Fincher ("Seven") helmed thriller starring Michael Douglas and Sean Penn.

LEED ON AT TRISTAR AS COLUMBIA LOSES JOSEPHSON

Exec VP Chris Lee's move up to president of production at TriStar Pictures makes him the first Asian American to ever hold that high a rank at a major studio. As the top executive at TriStar, Lee is effectively replacing the former president of TriStar Pictures, Robert Cooper, who resigned in May after less than a year on the job.

Lee oversaw "Jerry Maguire" said he will continue to oversee TriStar's "Godzilla" and "Starship Troopers" even as he takes on his new responsibilities. Lee started as a script reader and worked his way through the ranks. He was also the executive on "The Fisher King," "Philadelphia" and "Legends of the Fall." The installment of Lee ends speculation that Sony Pictures Entertainment was planning to merge Columbia and TriStar into one entity, since SPE president and COO John Calley had already integrated the story and business affairs units into one entity.

Insiders say Calley never got along with Cooper, who was brought in by former SPE head Mark Canton to TriStar last summer from HBO Pictures. When Canton left last year and Calley was appointed in November, Cooper became frustrated with Calley's very hands-on approach that didn't allow Cooper to operate autonomously. Rumors say Cooper may land at PolyGram or DreamWorks.

Meanwhile, Columbia Pictures president of production Barry Josephson, who was rumored to be a likely candidate to replace Cooper, will leave before his contract is up October 1. He may end up with a producing deal at Sony. His position will not be filled, as Columbia Pictures president Amy Pascal will take over Josephson's responsibilities. Josephson was considered one of the last executives with strong ties to the former Canton regime, as he was the first hire by Canton. Josephson was responsible for overseeing such big-budget action films as "Bad Boys," Money Train," "Anaconda," The Devil's Own" as well as this month's "Men In Black" and "Air Force One."

UNIVERSAL'S BACK TO THE BANK

Universal Studios Inc. recently sealed a $1.1 billion, biggest-deal-of-its-kind, three-year film financing agreement with Citibank (Citicorp Securities), the very financial institution that structured a similar $1 billion deal last year with 20th Century Fox. The money will go to financing 12-20 films per year (up to 60 films overall). Since the financing facility will be an "off-balance sheet" for Universal, the debt won't show up on parent company Seagram Co. Ltd.'s balance sheet.

Universal is just one of many major studios looking for ways to pay for the high cost of filmmaking without having to delve into the pockets of its parent company. The off-balance-sheet financing uses the anticipated value of the future films, packaged together, as a kind of bond or stock offering. The bank(s) or investors buy into units of the entire group of films rather than any one film. This way the studio doesn't have to go to the parent company but still gets to make movies, and the investors share in the film's profits but don't need to put all their eggs in one film basket. The off-balance-sheet financing is becoming a popular strategy that many studios are looking into for possible financing. Time Warner Inc. may line up a similar deal with Chase Securities to provide funds to its New Line Cinema.

IS POPCORN INCLUDED?—MOVIE THEATRE ADMISSIONS RISE TO $9

They say if it happens in New York, it's only a matter of time before it happens everywhere else in the country. If that's true, then moviegoers across the U.S. will be saddened to hear the price of an evening at the movies is on its way up. The Sony Lincoln Square multiplex in New York City recently upped their prices to an all-time high of nine dollars per ticket, a cost that is more than twice the national average for a trip to the silver screen.

Of course, New York is still better off than Japan, where a movie ticket goes for the equivalant of $15, but for American exhibitors three questions come to mind: Is it a sign of times to come? How much of that nine smackers do the exhibitors get to keep? And, most importantly, for that price, who can afford a night at the movies? But not all is lost—while New Yorkers may have to shell out the big bucks for their trip to "The Lost World," the price for a movie ticket in America still averages out to a mere $4.41.

EXHIBITION PIONEER PASSES AWAY

James Edwards Sr. dies at age 90

James Edwards Sr., founder and chairman of the nation's 13th-largest theatre chain, passed away at his Newport Beach, Calif. home on April 26, 1997, at the age of 90. Emblematic of the dynamic personality that characterized his career, he was launching a boat into the channel water behind his Newport Island home when he was felled by a heart attack.

It all began in 1930. With America in the Depression, Edwards reopened a bankrupt moviehouse, the Monterey in Monterey Park, a town in which he resided near Los Angeles. "I paid 20 percent of the gross for the lease, which was pretty stiff," he recalled to BOXOFFICE for our Edwards 65th anniversary story (Nov. 1995 issue). Always an innovator, Edwards set an audience conduct code ("We had a choice to make: keep the kids, or make the theatre a place that families would enjoy") and built a cry room for mothers and infants. The circuit grew; by year-end 1996, Edwards Theatres Circuit—now based in Newport Beach—had 427 screens at 90 sites, with a year-end 1998 forecast for 750 screens. "Maybe it was just plain stubbornness" is how Edwards explained his success. "When [my wife] Bernice and I didn't even have money to buy food, we kept hanging on. We both felt the movies were just the greatest source of entertainment."

FAMILY BUSINESS: Son James III and James Edwards Sr. outside an Edwards cinema.

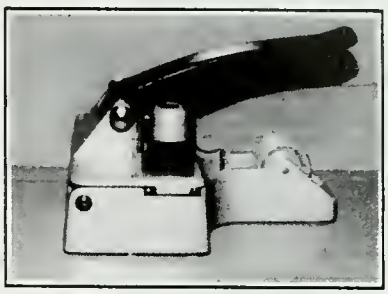
Born November 23, 1906, in downtown L.A.'s Boyle Heights section, Edwards was raised in the San Gabriel Valley, attended Alhambra High and was running his first theatre at age 23. His family was always a key component in the Edwards equation. Today, four generations of Edwards are involved in the business. Bernice, his wife of 64 years, was his partner at home and at work, and his children now head the company. Son James Edwards III is president and chief operating officer; daughter Joan Edwards Randolph is senior executive vice president and chief financial officer; another daughter, Carole Ann Ruoff, is assistant treasurer; grandson Don Barton is vice president and general sales manager; and great-grandson Brian Barton checks theatre operations.

"This is a family business," says Marcella Sheldon, James Edwards Sr.'s secretary almost from day one. (Sheldon joined the company in 1932; she describes that time this way: "I was the only employee he had." The company now has 2,400 staffers.) "He has established a strong foundation that will live on."



Edwards created his chain based on a philosophy of making people happy and having fun doing it. "He stood at the door and greeted people when they came in, and he asked them on the way out how they'd liked the picture," Sheldon says. But he was also a savvy businessman. In a move predating the modern multiplex era, Edwards put two screens into a single theatre in Alhambra in 1939. "He had a little storeroom there," Sheldon recalls, and after its transformation the Alhambra became a "Dual Theatre." At the Edwards Theatre in Costa Mesa, Calif. in the early 1960s, he was the first operator to show first-run films in Orange County, L.A. County's southerly neighbor.

His belief that state-of-the-art technology of the day enhances the moviegoing experience began with his first moviehouse, which touted the "latest Western Electric sound equipment" in its opening notice. That approach has continued into the 1990s, with Edwards opening the West Coast's first IMAX 3-D/PSE theatre. Having entered an expansion mode, the circuit also now installs digital sound, loveseat and high-back chairs, and stadium seating in its new sites. But attention to Hollywood glamor hasn't been forgotten: Edwards favored the use of Golden Age stylings for entrances and lobbies, giant neon marquees, and a substantial use of marble and brass throughout interiors. In that tradition, son James told BOXOFFICE in a March 1996 Exhibition Profile: "The excitement, I believe, really begins out on the sidewalk with the beautiful signage."

Although Edwards Sr. retired after suffering a heart attack in the 1950s, he rejoined the business within two years and remained active in day-to-day operations until his death. This year, he opened the Edwards Ontario 22, a much-discussed development within the industry given the presence across the street of an AMC 30-plex. The company has also announced plans for another 18 megaplexes, each featuring from 12 to 26 screens. Although most of its current sites are in Orange County, the chain has locations spanning from San Luis Obispo in Central California to San Diego on the Mexican border. The company this year will debut its first non-California site, a 21-screener in Boise, Idaho, where Edwards often vacationed.

Insight into the man Edwards was comes in a postscript he wrote for the souvenir program for the gala opening of the Garvey Theatre in Garvey, Calif. on March 27, 1937 (with a double bill of Gary Cooper's "The Plainsman" and Clark Gable's "Love on the Run"). Signed by Edwards, it reads in full: "When I finished dictating the foregoing contents of this Booklet to my Secretary preparatory for the printer, she said, 'Why don't you add a personal word, Mr. Edwards?' Here it is: 'The first job I had after getting through school was for Barker Brothers. The personnel manager promised me that if I worked hard, applied myself and was loyal I would get a promotion. I worked hard, applied myself to my job and was loyal to the store for five days; as I hadn't received my promised promotion, I quit. When I was getting my five-day check form the cashier, I recall the personnel manager referring to me as "that Jerk." I've never forgotten that; if he had called me a "Jirp," I wouldn't have minded; in fact, I would have been pleased. A Jirp is one who has: Judgment, Initiative, Responsibility, Personality. I hope all my Managers are Jirps.'"

CINEMARK'S FIRST BRAZIL SITE

Cinemark International, a subsidiary of Cinemark USA Inc., opened its first Brazilian multiplex. The Cinemark 12 Shopping Colinas in Sao Jose dos Campos opened its doors in May. Cinemark plans to build a total of 170 screens in 15 theatres in Brazil by the end of 1998. Newly announced are the Cinemark 11 Tambore in Sao Paulo; the Maxi Shopping 10 in Jundiai; the Novo Shopping 15 in Ribeirao Preto; the Shopping Uberlandia 10 in Uberlandia; and the Central Plaza 15 in Sao Paulo. In the Sao Paulo Metropolitan area, Cinemark is also building the SP Market 11; the Santo Andre ABC Plaza 10; the Interlagos 10; the Tatuape 8; the Aricanduva Shopping Leste 14; the Eldorado Jardins 5; and the Panamby 16; and in Rio de Janeiro, the Barra da Tijuca 12. Several of these theatres will have stadium seating, which will be a first for Brazil.

EDWARDS TO BUILD 18 NEW MEGAPLEXES

Edwards Theatres Circuit Inc., which opened three new megaplexes in April, has unveiled plans for construction to begin on 18 new megaplexes in Southern California within the next 12 months. Each will offer DTS, Dolby and SDDS sound systems; high-back chairs; stadium-style seating; and loveseats. Edwards currently operates 560 screens in 89 SoCal locations. The chain is projected to have 750 screens by the end of 1998.

MARCUS EXPANDS GROWTH PLAN

Milwaukee-based Marcus Theatres plans to accelerate its growth plan in Wisconsin, Illinois and Michigan. "Two years ago we announced plans to double the size of our circuit from 200 to 400 screens by the year 2000," says Bruce J. Olson, president of Marcus Theatres. "After a 32 percent expansion in our screen count last year, which was far and away the largest in company history and the second highest growth rate among the top 40 theatre circuits in the country, we're confidently raising our goal for the year 2000 to 500 screens." The initial goal of 400 is anticipated to be met by the end of 1998. Marcus currently operates 297 screens in Wisconsin and Illinois, and has begun retrofitting existing theatres with stadium seating.

AMC COLONIZES IN TEXAS

AMC will build a 24-screen, 5,000-seat megaplex, due to open in December, at the First Colony Mall in Sugar Land, Texas. Its "enhanced moviegoing environment" will offer stadium-style seating with 46-inch spacing between rows; loveseats with extra-wide retractable cushion cupholders; and AMC's exclusive High Impact Theater Systems (HITS), including Torus compound curved wall-to-wall screens and SDDS sound systems.

SHOWMANDISER PROMOTION OF THE MONTH

Extraterrestrial personages were out in 'force' to promote the re-release of "Star Wars" at Cortland, N.Y.'s Plaza Theatres. Plaza owner Sam Mitchell of SJM Entertainment and manager Dave Wayman convinced local businessmen Bill Cleary and Joe Balas to dress up as Darth Vader and the large-craniumed creature pictured above, respectively, to celebrate the intergalactic festivities. The Force was truly with the Plaza on opening night, when the theatre sold out every single showing of the sci-fi classic.

REGAL'S NET INCOME INCREASES 78 PERCENT

Regal Cinemas president and chief executive officer Michael Campbell announced that the company's net income increased 78 percent for the quarter ending April 3, 1997, with total revenues increasing 40.6 percent. "Regal had an outstanding start to 1997, producing financial results for the first quarter than exceed expectations," says Campbell. "In addition to the continued substantial expansion of screens in operation and increased operating efficiencies, our results benefitted from a strong slate of films, which generated record first quarter results for the industry." Campbell adds that Regal's screen count grew 26.6 percent to 1,325 screens at 159 locations from 1,047 in 135 locations at the same time last year.

Regal recently announced several new upcoming builds, including a 22-plex in Warrington, Pa.; a 16-plex in Willoughby, Ohio; a 12-plex in Hampton, Va.; an 18-plex in Henrietta, N.Y.; and an 8-plex in Morganville, N.J.

LOEWS OPENS 18-PLEX IN STAFFORD, TEXAS

Loews Theatres (formerly Sony) has opened an all-stadium seating 18-plex, the Loews Fountains Theatre, in Stafford, Texas. Referred to by Loews as a "modern-day movie palace," the Loews Fountain combines the grandeur of "golden era" moviehouses with the latest in technologies and amenities. The theatre showcases the Loews "Star" design, featuring a huge art deco-styled lobby with a dramatic arched glass atrium ceiling. Each auditorium will range from 200 to 700 seats, with total seating for 4,800. The Fountain will anchor Stafford's Fountains On The Lake retail center, located on Fountain Lake Drive.

CINEPLEX BREAKS GROUND ON CHICAGO PLEXES

Toronto-based Cineplex Odeon and its Chicago-based development Inner City Entertainment broke ground on the first of three new multiplexes to be located in Chicago's inner-city communities. The theatres mark the continuation of Cineplex's plans to build state-of-the-art complexes in urban areas across the United States. "[We're making] a pledge to not only bring entertainment to the community, but also to provide employment for its residents," says Allen Karp, president and CEO of Cineplex. Over 400 permanent and part-time jobs will be available through the three developments. All three sites will open in late November.

CENTURY BITES INTO ORANGE MARKET

Century Theatres, headquartered in San Francisco, has broken ground in on its Stadium Promenade 25 in Orange, Calif. The multiplex will anchor a 179,000-square-foot retail entertainment center developed by Syufy Enterprises (Century's parent company). The theatre will be all-stadium seating, with the latest in sound and presentation technologies. Its architectural character is described as being reminiscent of the art deco style of the '30s and '40s, with dramatic lighting and tall vertical palm trees gracing the facade. The Stadium Promenade is slated for a Thanksgiving opening.

GOODRICH: BAY CITY ROLLERS

Goodrich Quality Theaters Inc., which operates 136 screens in Michigan, Indiana and Illinois, will add two screens to the Bay City 6 Theatre located in Grand Rapids, Mich.'s Bay City Mall. According to Carrie Suntken, Goodrich's marketing manager, the theatre is being expanded due to an increasing demand for more first-run films. "With the expansion, we will bring an even greater opportunity for the Bay City area to see hit films at a convenient location," says Suntken. The Bay City 8 is scheduled to re-open this fall. Other Goodrich theatres currently being built include the Kalamazoo 10 in Oshtemo, Mich.; the Portage 9 in Portage, Ind.; and the Kendall 10 in Oswego, Ill.

MUVICO GOES TO TOWN WITH RENOVATIONS

Muvico Town Center, located in Boca Raton, Fla., has re-opened after undergoing major renovations. The changes include a brand new facade, lobby, concessions stand, state-of-the-art boxoffice, and new restrooms. The re-opening weekend celebrations included live music in the lobby and face painting and balloon art for kids. Also recently renovated was Muvico's Hialeah 14, which received a new art deco facade, as well as upgrades throughout the lobby area. Ft. Lauderdale-based Muvico has 61 screens throughout Florida, with 117 screens being built in the Southeastern United States, the Caribbean and South America.

ONE BILLION PEOPLE DISCOVER "HIDDEN CITY"

An estimated one billion people will see "Hidden City," a two-minute trailer that its producers hope will promote awareness and inspire action to protect the world's coral reefs. The trailer premiered at the AMC Century 14 in Los Angeles, and will be shown on more than 5,000 screens in the U.S. and Canada. The trailer was produced by Earth Communications Office (ECO), a non-profit coalition of organizations and individuals within the entertainment industry working together to promote environmental awareness and responsible action. Kodak was one of ECO's initial sponsors in 1991 when they created their first environmental awareness trailer, "Wonderful World," and since then Kodak has donated all of the film each year to produce thousands of prints.

Q&A: DREAMWORKS DATABASE ANALYZES PLAY PATTERNS

With entertainment industry moguls Steven Spielberg, Jeffrey Katzenberg and David Geffen at the helm, it's no wonder that DreamWorks is already known for being a studio that pushes the envelope, even before it's released its first film (which will be "The Peacemaker" this September). Mark Christiansen, who heads up DreamWorks' distribution operations, tells* Boxoffice *about the company's latest innovation: a computer program that can instantly analyze how a genre of film performs in a given region, state, city or theatre.

Boxoffice: Describe the electronic delivery system that you're involved with pertaining to boxoffice figures.

MARK CHRISTIANSEN: We do receive electronic boxoffice feeds—everyone does, of their own numbers, from EDI. It's much easier to sort through the data when it's on a computer as opposed to when it's on a couple hundred pages of paper. The electronic delivery of the figures is not a new technology. We have put in some new systems which use that electronic feed much more than anyone's used before.

Boxoffice: Can you tell me about the system?

CHRISTIANSEN: It's a system [that DreamWorks designed] which allows the salespeople to use historical data to see how theatres play certain types of films. So you can look up and see how a particular theatre plays action films, or how they play animated films, so that you can make a decision as to which theatre you might want to play on a particular kind of film you have for sale.

Boxoffice: Regarding the small mom-and-pop theatres that may not have great clout or draw, do you make any provisions for them?

CHRISTIANSEN: This [program] does show what the theatre can do dollar-wise, but we don't look at it that way on a particular genre. It shows how a theatre performs percentage-wise. So whether we're looking at a very high-grossing theatre or a very low-grossing theatre, it will still show whether that theatre tends to over-perform [or under-perform] for its own level on a particular genre. So if it's a guy who generally grosses $1,000 a week, but when he plays animated films, he grosses $2,000 a week, it'll show that this guy's over-performing on animated film by 100 percent.

Boxoffice: Is this an example of how DreamWorks plans to re-invent industry standards?

CHRISTIANSEN: [Laughs] I don't think we're trying to re-invent industry standards. Historically, the distribution companies all had local branches, and in each local branch, the local branch manager knew about the theatres. He'd been to the theatres, he knew the people who owned the theatres, he—he or she—knew how that particular theatre might perform on a given product. Now, we only have two offices. We have New York and Los Angeles. And we may not have anyone in this office who's ever been to Billings, Montana. So what we're trying to do is to find a way to get an insight into markets that we don't [otherwise] have, because we don't have someone who's physically in that area to go see that theatre. We're trying to give ourselves more information about a market, so that we can target our movies to the theatres that it makes the most sense for them to play. And this is something that's good for both the distributor and the exhibitor. It certainly doesn't make sense for an exhibitor to play films that don't tend to perform well in their theatre. And conversely, it doesn't help us to place our film into a theatre that will under-perform on a product if there's another theatre available that tends to over-perform on the product.

Boxoffice: What are some of the other innovations that you're involved with?

CHRISTIANSEN: DreamWorks was envisioned from the very beginning as a company that would make maximum use of all new technologies, and that goes from production to distribution to accounting—anything you want to look at within DreamWorks. We're definitely trying to use the latest technology to push forward what's currently being done.

Boxoffice: What are some other things DreamWorks does differently as a studio?

CHRISTIANSEN: There's a genuine teamwork philosophy at DreamWorks, and I would say that the boundaries between departments are less defined at DreamWorks than they are at some other companies.

Boxoffice: There aren't official job titles at DreamWorks. What is that meant to convey?

CHRISTIANSEN: What it's meant to convey is that anyone within this company can have something to say, and it shouldn't matter what their rank is within the company. That shouldn't dictate how much weight we give to a particular idea. Where I've seen that really come into play is when you're in a meeting, anyone at that meeting can put an idea out on the table, and since they are not a senior vice president or a director or a manager—they don't have a title—no one says, "Well, I think we should really pay attention to that, because that person has a high rank," or "That person is an assistant—we don't care what they have to say."

Boxoffice: And it's not confusing?

CHRISTIANSEN: No, I don't think it's confusing at all. The way that we say what jobs we have is that we define what we do. So I don't have a title, but when anyone asks me what I do, I say I'm the head of operations for distribution.

Boxoffice: What would you say is your main focus at present?

CHRISTIANSEN: We're trying to put together a good system to support the sales department in their efforts to get the DreamWorks films out into the market.—Christine James

European News Notes by Melissa Morrison

LEAD STORY: ITALY'S QUALITY QUOTAS

ROME—Two major Italian movie funders, Mediaset and RAI, have announced plans to up their respective budgets for film production. Mediaset, the media group of business kingpin (and former Italian Prime Minister) Silvio Berlusconi, said that it will dedicate 10 percent of its advertising revenues to boosting its own film and TV production. The announcement by one of Italy's most powerful private media enterprises is welcome news in a country where film production is suffering from the withdrawal of traditional state subsidies. In 1995, production fell to a postwar low of 75 films, totaling investments worth $153.5 million. Mediaset's contribution is expected to total $150 million annually, about two-fifths of which would go to cinema productions. The announcement could pave the way for similar commitments from the private sector, which is regarded as the Italian industry's savior, and was welcomed by the country's deputy prime minister, Walter Veltroni. Veltroni is regarded as a cinema supporter who wants to boost private investment with tax breaks as a replacement for government subsidies. Mediaset's announcement comes as the Italian Parliament considers a law that would require national TV networks to allot 30 percent of their production and acquisition budgets for European movies and programs. Mediaset's Managing Director Carlo Bernasconi criticized government-imposed quotas, saying they would drive down the quality of productions. State broadcaster RAI announced a few weeks later that it would increase its budget for the production of films and TV programs, tipping the balance of its resources away from the acquisition of outside productions. A spokesman said the broadcaster would do so with the intention of replacing American fare with Italian and European programs. Like Mediaset's proclamation, RAI's announcement was also seen as an attempt by a media company to avoid government controls by setting its own guidelines.

POLYGRAM GRABS LOAN, CARLTON REORGANIZES

CANNES—There were deals aplenty at the recent Cannes Film Festival as it's considered the place for companies to announce their latest goings-on. In an agreement that marks a first for the European Investment Bank (EIB), PolyGram has been granted an $80 million loan to partially finance films produced under the PolyGram Filmed Entertainment label. According to EIB's statement, the financed films will be "targeted to the general-interest and family entertainment market" and will be lensed primarily in the European Union. It is the first loan of its kind to the film industry. Brian Unwin, EIB president, said the aid was to promote Europe's entertainment industry and "enhance its international competitiveness." PolyGram recently scored big with the Oscar-winning "Fargo." Upcoming titles include "Welcome to Sarajevo" and the next Coen brothers' film, "The Big Lebowski."

Meanwhile, Carlton Film Distributors (CFD), which was formerly Rank Film Distributors (RFD) before Carlton Communications paid out $107 million for the distribution arm, cut back a third of its staff—some 20 jobs off the roster. George Helyer, CFD's new managing director, who used to be the number two man at RFD, said he was happy with the changes. Insiders say Carlton Communications is now looking to acquire Rank's Pinewood Studios.

GROWTH SPURTS

BUDAPEST—Cinema-expansion news from opposite sides of the continent: Hungary's lead as the former East Bloc country with the most multiplexes widens with the announcement that major distributor/exhibitor Budapest Film plans two more like its pioneering Corvin cinema. A new, private offshoot of the formerly state-owned company has been set up to attract foreign investment to finance the new complexes. Budapest Film invested $3.6 million into the Corvin last September, converting an existing theatre from 1,100 seats to 1,500 and outfitting it with six screens and Dolby sound. As a result, admissions in the Hungarian capital have risen 25 percent since 1995 to 125,000. The Corvin was the first of a string of multiplexes, including one by Intercom (the country's largest distributor), Australia's Village Roadshow and Canada's Cineplex Odeon. The latter two companies have announced plans to build additional cinemas in the country. (Budapest Film itself will undergo a transformation: In January, its distribution wing, which is municipally owned, will become a wholly private company.)

Over in London, Virgin Cinemas has announced it will accelerate its expansion plans in 1997, devoting $54.9 million to fixing up and building new theatres, rather than the $31 million it had originally intended to spend. The change was inspired by an especially good 1996, in which the company reported a 90 percent increase in operating profits, for a total of $21.5 million. Virgin plans to build 20 new multiplexes by 2000.

CLEAN CARS AND DIRTY DEALINGS

ST. PETERSBURG—Victor Sergeyev, the new head of renowned Russian studio Lenfilm, is trying to scrub up business by launching (of all things) a chain of car washes, while stunning the country with his film about government corruption. The car-wash business is meant to restore income to the studio, which hit its financial and creative nadir last year, producing a single film. State funding has been slashed, and Lenfilm's production services for foreign productions (the bread-and-butter of post-communist studios) have been usurped by such foreign competitors as the Czech Republic's Barrandov Studios. Lenfilm will build 20 car-wash machines on St. Petersburg's outskirts, and should attract a lot of business since the city's governor announced that driving a dirty car within the city would now be against the law. The State Auto Inspectorate, GAI, will receive a portion of the profits in return for its officers directing dirty cars to the machines. The studio hopes to earn $2 million annually—same as its current budget—from the side business, for which it took out a $3 million loan. Some would argue that Russia's government should devote itself to cleaning up its politicians rather than its cars. Sergeyev's just-released film "Schizophrenia" draws a startlingly bleak picture of the new Russia with its story of a former KGB officer who carries out hits on prominent figures. The film's veracity has been ensured by its main consultant, Alexander Korzhakov, himself a former KGB officer as well as President Boris Yeltsin's former bodyguard. The plot is reportedly based on a true account by a Russian mafia godfather.

SAVED BY THE BELL

MADRID—Spain is another European country grappling with the threat of reduced government funding for film productions. Most recently, the Culture Ministry narrowed the subsidies available to movies by requiring that a film generate at least $350,000 in boxoffice receipts before it can qualify for a subsidy, up 67 percent from the former requirement. The plan also lowers the ceiling for subsidies, which can compose no more than one-third of a film's budget, from $1.4 million to a little over $1 million.

Some good news, however: The country's telecom behemoth, Telefonica, is considering investing in local productions as a way of smoothing the film sectors' opposition to the perceived competition of digital TV, which should be launched in Spain by the summer. Telefonica, which is a semi-public company, has had discussions with producer Andres Vincente Gomez's Lola Films, as well as other companies. Telefonica's representative in the talks is producer Pedro Perez, a former head of the Spanish producers federation, FAPAE. According to Telefonica, the telecom would create a financing and sales operation similar to that operated by the media group Prisa. And on the wholly private end of the spectrum, at least one production and financing company, Sogetel, has pumped up its commitment to films. So far this year, Sogetel has co-production plans with six different entities, as well as a commitment from broadcaster Tele 5 to fund three of its films in the next two years.

SHORT TAKE

HAMBURG—Ten European countries will band together to promote their films around Europe, an example of lightweights and middleweights teaming up to battle a champion heavyweight—America. Film export federations from the United Kingdom, Austria, Germany, France, Switzerland, the Flanders half of Belgium, the Netherlands, Spain, Portugal, and Italy have established the European Film Promotion. The organization will be based in Hamburg and its board will consist of president Claudia Landsberger of Holland Film, Bruno Barthemy of Unifrance, and Christian Dorsch of the German Export Union. The union seeks to promote members' films collectively at international festivals.

Q&A: ANICA'S ALBERTO FIORETTI ON ITALIAN CINEMA

Italy's ANICA (National Association for the Cinematography and Audiovisual Industry) has a challenge tougher than a two-day-old biscotti ahead of it. The trade association for movie producers and distributors, as well as others in the audiovisual industry, is facing one of the bleakest periods for Italian cinema. Production in 1995 reached a postwar low of 75 films. Although that number improved by 24 films in 1996, domestic films got only 20 percent of Italy's market. Abroad, the figures are even worse. Italian exports are below 2 percent elsewhere in Europe and even lower in the United States, according to a 1996 study. The slashing of government funds for promotion abroad is one reason. Others say that, except for the occasional "Il Postino," the Italian industry hasn't returned to the days when lira rained down upon the glory of Federico Fellini and Michelangelo Antonioni. Alberto Fioretti, ANICA's foreign-department representative, discusses what his organization intends to do about it.

BOXOFFICE: How is ANICA dealing with Italian cinema's low period?

ALBERTO FIORETTI: ANICA works with the government department for movies and discusses from the point of view of the producer how to improve the new low. As you know, we have some problems selling Italian films abroad, because, as everywhere, the Americans are powerful in distribution. So we try to improve distribution abroad. Our minister now is not the minister for money, he's the minister for the culture, Mr. (Walter) Veltroni, and he's starting a new formula for promoting Italian film abroad. That's why we are now discussing a joint promotion between Italy and France. That could be a good idea, because in some countries if you go alone, you are lost.

That's why we are now discussing a joint promotion between Italy and France. That could be a good idea, because in some countries if you go alone, you are lost.

BOXOFFICE: You say the American distribution machine is the reason Italian films have trouble with distribution abroad?

FIORETTI: They make a lot of good pictures, and the people are used to the American style. So every country—like France, like us, like Germany—finds some difficulties in promoting and distributing film in foreign countries. Even in markets where we're usually successful, like South America [because of similarities in language], we have some problems now, because even these countries are used to American films.

BOXOFFICE: How else do you plan to improve distribution abroad?

FIORETTI: We still continue to attend all the festivals—Berlin, Cannes, Moscow—and make a couple of Italian promotions. Maybe we have to use more media promotion, to do something in television, to improve the forum for promotion.

BOXOFFICE: Italian film has a good reputation in the United States. What caused the decline of popularity of Italian films in the United States and elsewhere?

FIORETTI: I read something in the States where they say there is no more Fellini. But that's not true. The problem is to educate the audience to go to see an Italian film. Maybe there is a chance, because the people are growing tired of the usual American film with the violence. I don't say that all the American pictures are like that, because many are very good, but the people now maybe would like to go see more European film. That's important also for the country identity, the cultural identity.

BOXOFFICE: How would you characterize Italian cinema right now?

FIORETTI: From the cultural point of view, it is good. It starts again in a new direction. The number of films is down from before. Before we made 100, 150 features. Now we are making 65 or 70 features. So the quantity is down, but the quality is good. The last success is "Il Ciclone" [directed by Leonardo Pieraccioni], which made probably 50 billion lira in our state.

PACIFIC OVERTURES

NOTES FROM THE PACIFIC RIM by Susan Lambert

LEAD STORY: FUNDING AND OTHER (NARROWLY AVOIDED) CATASTROPHES

SYDNEY—The Australian film industry breathed a collective sigh of relief when the new federal budget was unveiled in May and, despite rumors of impending cuts, the funding for film held strong. The budget for the 1997-1998 fiscal year allocates AU$115 million ($89.7 million) for the film and television production industry which is under current subsidy levels of AU$140 million (US$109 million), but the majority of the cuts affect television and not film subsidies. Concern over potential budget cuts was so high that the Australian film industry was fighting back well before the budget was due. A group of Australia's key industry leaders and top talent wrote a letter to Prime Minister John Howard in April to lobby in support of funding for the film industry. Signatories to the letter included notable actors, actresses, producers and directors as well as representatives from the directors, writers, editors, composers and cinematography guilds. Then a delegation, which included director Gillian Armstrong, actress Judy Davis and producer Jan Chapman, among others, met with Sen. Richard Alston, federal arts minister, to lobby for support of the industry.

The lobbying seemed to do its job. Australia's main funding agency, Film Finance Corp., will maintain a budget of AU$48 million (US$37.4 million) until 2001. Outgoing FFC chief executive John Morris was pleased with the stability four years of committed funding would bring. The Australian Film Commission will receive AU$11.5 million and Film Australia, a documentary producer, will receive a guaranteed AU$5 million per year until 1999, when the government hopes to privatize the organization.

Meanwhile, exhibition in the land down under is also holding strong. Village Roadshow upgraded its popular Frankston, Victoria fourplex to an eight-screen theatre for a cost of AU$6 million (US$4.7 million). Competitor Hoyts Cinemas opened an eight-screen complex in Booragoon, near Perth, on June 17, and announced a 12-screen (to be expanded to 16 screens) build in Wetherill Park (the western district of Sydney), which Hoyts expects to open in July of 1998.

Boxoffice revenues seem to be on the rise, at least in China's two largest markets: Shanghai reported $31 million in boxoffice revenues last year, and Beijing reported receipts totalling $14 million. And the domestic film industry has received a great shot in the arm with the success of "Days Without the Hero," a drama about a martyred soldier, which earned record boxoffice (4.4 million yuan/US$530,000) for a domestic film.

Meanwhile, Shanghai-based consortium Smile—a partnership with local Chinese investors, Kuala Lumpur-based South Malaysian Industries and UCI—opened its first mulitplex in Chuongquing. The five-screen, 1,218-seat, state-of-the-art complex premiered with "Dante's Peak" and features a Showscan Dynamic Motion Simulator. And this month, the venture expects to open a six-screen, 1,500 seat cinema in Wuhan. Next up will be the refurbishing of a Huxi entertainment center in Shanghai.

MOVIES R US

TOKYO—Businessman Den Fujita (chairman of toy retailer Toys R Us Japan) has teamed up with United Cinemas International (UCI—the Paramount/Universal international joint venture) in a partnership to develop and operate multiplex theatres in Japan. The first project is scheduled to open next February in Sapporo, Japan's northernmost major city. The 12-screen, 2,987-seat Sapporo Factory Cinema will be built around an existing screen that was part of an IMAX theatre. UCI and Fujita (who also holds a 50 percent stake in Blockbuster Japan's video store chain and 2,000 Japanese McDonald's franchises) are reportedly each investing $2 billion yen ($16.7 million). The Fujita/UCI venture hopes to develop 20 multiplexes with 200 screens in Japan over the next five years.

Separate from the Fujita deal, UCI (one of four foreign multiplex companies operating in Japan) has plans to open a 2,456-seat nine-plex in Kanazawa in September. They have had record attendance at Otsu in western Japan where they opened a multiplex last November. The boom of multiplex building in Japan is expected to boost the number of screens from approximately 1,800 to well over 2,000 by the year 2000.

CHINA MOVING INTO MODERN AGE

SHANGHAI—Jiangsu-based Yangtze Film Co. recently acquired rights for computer ticketing software from film importer China Film for 300,000 yuan (US$37,500). The move ushers theatres in China's Jiangsu province into the modern-day. The system will be installed in 50 theatres by the end of this month, with plans for 100 theatres to be outfitted by the end of 1997. The ticketing software will enable moviegoers to purchase tickets for shows at any of the networked theatres and allow accurate and timely boxoffice revenue figures—which is often difficult to come by in China where underreporting to avoid taxation is rampant.

HARLEY'S HIGH HOPES FOR NEW ZEALAND FILM

WELLINGTON—Ruth Harley, the new CEO of the New Zealand Film Commission, says New Zealand, which produced such filmmakers as Jane Campion ("The Piano"), Peter Jackson ("Heavenly Creatures") and Lee Tamahori ("Once Were Warriors"), should try to increase its film output to six titles per year with help from foreign investments of both money and market endorsements. The local film industry currently gets about US$6 million annually in public funding, which is divided up between usually three to four features. Since the breakaway successes of the early '90s, few New Zealand films have followed the critical and commercial results of "The Piano," Heavenly Creatures" and "Once Were Warriors." Harley, who was appointed to head New Zealand's chief funding agency in April, hopes that their two new films at Cannes can help turn that around: "The Ugly," a thriller about a serial killer by Scott Reynolds who just completed a second New Zealand feature, "Heaven" (Miramax is distributing in the United States), and a twisted twentysomthing comedy, "Topless Women Talk About Their Lives," by Harry Sinclair. What can also help the local filmmakers is the good news that New Zealand boxoffice is on the rise. For the first quarter of '97 (ending April 30), boxoffice results are reported at NZ$38.7 million (US$26.7 million) which is a 31 percent increase over the same period from last year. 1996 first quarter results were NZ$29.5 million (US$20 million).

Screen Stars

QSC Professional Amplifiers supply power to the hottest screens in the country.

In fact, QSC Audio is the largest supplier of professional amplifiers and accessories to the cinema industry. Legendary reliability, awesome performance, versatile features and outstanding value have made QSC the industry standard. Fourteen amplifier models are currently approved for THX® cinema installations, with more on the way! Each model carries a commercial UL listing, as well as TUV and CSA approval for safety. Optional QSC plug-in accessories are available to meet the specific signal processing requirements of digital cinema sound systems.

Optional accessary capability optimizes amps for bi-amplication of screen channels, protects surround speakers and equalizes the response of popular cinema subwoofers.

Audiences demand the most powerful presentation of everything that digital soundtracks have to offer. Because power amplifiers are critical to the digital sound chain, QSC powers todays biggest Screen Stars. Stars demand the best. Shouldn't you? Call 714-754-6175 for valuable details.

THE CHRISTIE P35GP PROJECTOR WITH LED SOUNDHEAD RAISES SOUND AND LIGHT TO A HIGHER LEVEL.

When it comes to extraordinary sound from conventional analog prints and greater light efficiency, the Christie P35GP projector reaches a new height of performance.

The Christie LED soundhead features a high-intensity LED array from Dolby Labs that provides uniform illumination across the entire soundtrack. It reduces level-dependent distortion, improves stereo imaging, increases dynamic realism and eliminates interference due to stray light.

With a flat frequency response extending to 16kHz, it reproduces sound with the exceptional detail and clarity previously heard only from digital. Thanks to the reverse scanning system, crosstalk is eliminated between the optical soundtracks.

No more exciter bulb, exciter supply, or time-consuming realignments. You'll now enjoy an expected life span of more than five years, further lowering your operating costs.

See and hear for yourself how the new Christie projector with improved shutter design and LED soundhead reveals the true capabilities of your surround system and increases the visual quality on your screen.

A Special Word of GREETINGS

Last August, BOXOFFICE announced the expansion of our regular international coverage via an issue dedicated to the Australian exhibition marketplace, arranged to coincide with the Australian Movie Convention. Reader interest in the Australian Movie Convention was significant enough to warrant elevating this event to annual status, and the folks we met at the Motion Picture Exhibitors Association of Queensland, which sponsors the AMC, have rapidly become good friends of all at this magazine.

To help spread the word, we again have asked Richard Parton, president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors Association of Queensland, to say a few words to our readers. Mr. Parton graciously assented with the following message of greetings.

The Motion Picture Exhibitors Association of Queensland hosts the official Movie Convention in Australia again this year at the Royal Pines Resort on the Gold Coast. The Convention is attended by film executives from every state in Australia, who now consider this convention a "must attend" event, and it is pleasing to see delegates in ever-increasing numbers from New Zealand and the United States.

We look forward to our Convention providing a forum for new ideas and innovations, along with opportunities to view the product from all distribution companies, to hear leading film executives address our delegates in open forum discussions and, most importantly, to renew friendships and business relationships. The Australian Movie Convention remains the place where our business gets done, by the people who do it: the exhibitors, directors, producers, film distributors and stars.

The Convention is also a welcome venue for the companies who help make the movie experience special: The distributors and manufacturers of the cold beverages, fresh popcorn, comfortable seats, and sound equipment on display at our Trade Exhibition. As the Australian industry continues one of its most exciting eras, with cinema attendance growing, theatre construction booming and new technology making movies more of an "event" than ever, our Trade Show is a must for all delegates, no matter where their home market, who want a glimpse of the future of cinema presentation.

Our small association, formed some 52 years ago as an informal forum for exhibition and distribution, has matured. Today this association, with the enormous and mostly voluntary commitment of its membership, is responsible for a gathering of the motion picture industry once a year in Australia which is now truly going "global."

The Australian Movie Convention has grown from its first convention of 50 delegates to today where we anticipate many hundreds of delegates from within Australia and overseas. Recognition has been created by forming partnerships with industry publications in spreading the word. I sincerely thank BOXOFFICE MAGAZINE for its great contributions in assisting us in this regard.

The challenge for the hosts of the Australian Movie Convention is to bring every facet of our industry together in a meaningful way. Our agenda is to preview major film companies' product, discuss industry changes with leading film executives, visit the Trade Exhibition, salute Boxoffice Achievements in Australia, recognize Australian film and stars with our Annual Australian Star of the Year Award and, most importantly, to provide our delegates with a reason to return to the Convention annually.

We will make changes, some small, some big, but each is designed with to provide our delegates with an informative and fun convention.

As President, along with my Committee, I welcome everyone to this year's Convention and look forward to meeting not only our Australian delegates but hopefully new delegates from overseas. Our goal is a simple one: that once you attend our Convention on the Gold Coast of Australia, you will want to come back, again and again.

Sincerely,

R. J. Parton

HOLLYWOOD UPDATES

Merger of the Month:

Susie Golin, head of exhibitor relations for Digital Theater Systems, and Tom Daugherty, director of engineering and maintenance for Mann Theatres, married April 19 in Lake Tahoe. The two met in November '95 at Mann's Janss Marketplace Theatre opening in Thousand Oaks, Calif. They ran into each other several more times at business functions, and began dating in July of '96. It was soon obvious that it was the sort of love match only found in the movies—or at least the movie business.

Miramax must be "Scream"-ingly happy to have reached an agreement with Sony over a title tug-of-war. Sony had claimed it controls rights to the title "Scream," based on the studio's little-seen 1995 sci-fi thriller "Screamers" (which grossed a mere $6 million domestically). And the MPAA agreed, ruling against Miramax for using the title on the Wes Craven-directed horror-thriller blockbuster, which has grossed more than $100 million to date. Miramax was going to have to pay a fine of $1,500 per day, per screen—an exorbitant $1.8 million a day. With "Scream 2" already in the works, titled "Scream Again," the franchise had even more at stake. Fortunately for Miramax, a settlement was struck between the two studios, though the terms were not revealed. Reportedly, it involved Miramax dropping a separate dispute with Sony.

The final cut of the Joe Eszterhas-scripted satire "An Alan Smithee Film" so dismayed director Arthur Hiller that he took his name off it, thereby making it, ironically enough, an Alan Smithee film. The movie, based on the Directors Guild's default credited pseudonym for filmmakers who withdraw from a project, is about a fictional director whose real name is Alan Smithee, and when he tries to take his name off an abominable film, he finds he can't due to the moniker mandate.

Producer Jerry Bruckheimer ("Con Air") has extended his production deal with The Walt Disney Motion Picture Group for an additional five years. Bruckheimer is currently in pre-production on the Bruce Willis starrer "Armageddon" for Disney's Touchstone. The film will be directed by Michael Bay, who has helmed two other Bruckheimer-produced actioners, "The Rock" and "Bad Boys."

"Con Air" helmer Simon West has formed Wychwood Prods., and already has a first-look deal with Propaganda Films. Jih Polhemus, former director of development for the Dino De Laurentiis Co., has been named vice president of Wychwood, and is overseeing the development of the company's first project, the gothic thriller "Shelley's Garden," about a woman who is haunted by the spirit of her brother.

Michael Douglas' and Steve Reuther's Douglas/Reuther, the production company behind Paramount's "Face/Off" and "The Ghost and the Darkness," is negotiating a joint agreement with Paramount and Universal. This would allow both studios to share the financial risks, and presumably split Douglas/Reuther distribution rights domestically and internationally.

Chris O'Donnell, most recently seen as the Boy Wonder in Warner Bros.' "Batman and Robin," has announced two upcoming projects his Warner-based production company, George Street Pictures, is working on. The first is the romantic holiday comedy "The Flight Before Christmas," in which O'Donnell will star as a pilot who gets an ultimatum from his girlfriend on Christmas Eve. In a play on "A Christmas Carol," he's visited by three ghosts who give him glimpses into his relationships with women, past, present and future. The second film is a thriller involving the New York marathon called "A Day in November," in which O'Donnell will also star.

DreamWorks has emerged the victor in a mad dash among studios to sign Cameron Crowe to a multi-picture pact after the writer/director/producer's most recent effort, "Jerry Maguire," garnered blockbuster status and critical kudos aplenty. Crowe has signed a three-year, first-look deal with DreamWorks, and is currently writing a project that he will direct for the studio, but at press time, details were under wraps.

HOLLYWOOD REPORT

DARTH VADER

A "Star" Is Reborn

SUPERMAN

"Super" Duper

GODZILLA

Oh, "God!" Book II

STAR WARS PREQUELS Casting has begun on the three prequels to George Lucas' sci-fi epic "Star Wars." Rumored to be titled "The Balance of the Force," "Rise of the Empire" and "Fall of the Jedi," the prequels will star Liam Neeson ("Michael Collins") as a new character, the Master Jedi Knight; Ewan McGregor ("Trainspotting") as young Obi-Wan Kenobi; eight-year old Jake Lloyd ("Jingle All the Way") as young Anakin Skywalker (destined to become Darth Vader), and Natalie Portman ("Mars Attacks!") as the future Mrs. Anakin Skywalker (and Luke and Leia's mother). Sir Alec Guinness (the original Obi-Wan) is expected to return, possibly as a narrator; Samuel L. Jackson, Harry Connick Jr. and Terence Stamp are also in talks to join up. Lucas wrote the script for the first of the films and will direct it when it begins shooting at Leavesden Studios in London this fall. The first film is scheduled for release in May 1999, with parts two and three slated to come out in 2001 and 2003. (Distribution is to be set)

"SUPERMAN" The legendary Man of Steel of comic book, TV and feature film fame will be incarnated once again on the bigscreen, this time with Nicolas Cage ("Con Air") donning the blue and red tights and cape ensemble. Jim Carrey—who battled another mythic superhero when he co-starred as Riddler in "Batman Forever"—is in talks to play villain Brainiac. (Chief nemesis Lex Luthor and love interest Lois Lane have yet to be cast.) Tim Burton, also familiar with the genre, having directed "Batman" and "Batman Returns," will helm. A 'Batty' cameo by Michael Keaton is rumored. (Warner)

"MIGHTY JOE YOUNG" Charlize Theron ("Devil's Advocate") will star in this remake of the 1949 classic about a girl from Africa who is persuaded to perform with her "pet" 15-foot-tall gorilla in Las Vegas in order to save him from the danger of poachers. The substantial simian subsequently goes on a rampage through Los Angeles. Bill Paxton ("Twister") will play a zoologist who helps the girl try to save the massive monkey. David Paymer ("Quiz Show"), Regina King ("Jerry Maguire") and Naveen Andrews ("The English Patient") will also star, and Ron Underwood ("Speechless") will helm. The film is planned for a Memorial Day 1998 release. (Buena Vista)

"GODZILLA" The duo behind the special-effects laden megablockbuster "Independence Day," writer/director Roland Emmerich and writer/producer Dean Devlin, will re-team in this remake of the famed monster movie about a colossal rampaging reptile. Matthew Broderick ("Addicted to Love") stars as a scientist, and Maria Pitillo ("Dear God") plays his girlfriend, who's an aspiring TV reporter. Jean Reno ("For Roseanna"), Hank Azaria ("The Birdcage") and Harry Shearer ("This Is Spinal Tap") also star. (TriStar)

"JACKIE BROWN" Returning to the helm for the first time since "Pulp Fiction" (not counting his "Four Rooms" segment), Quentin Tarantino once again forays into the crime comedy genre with his adaptation of the Elmore Leonard novel "Rum Punch." '70s blaxploitation star Pam Grier ("Scream, Blacula, Scream!") will play a flight attendant who teams up with a burned-out bail bondsman (Robert Forster of the '70s TV show "Banyon") to double-cross a band of arms dealers, headed by Samuel L. Jackson ("A Time To Kill"). Robert De Niro ("Sleepers") will play Jackson's dim-witted sidekick. Michael Keaton is also in talks to join the cast. (Miramax)

"RUSH HOUR" In this action-comedy, when the Chinese ambassador's daughter is kidnapped, an FBI agent (Chris Tucker, "The Fifth Element") is ordered to keep the ambassador's security chief (Jackie Chan, "First Strike") from trying to assist in the investigation. Brett Ratner ("Money Talks") directs. (New Line)

"MIDNIGHT IN THE GARDEN OF GOOD AND EVIL" Clint Eastwood, who last helmed and starred in "Absolute Power," will go behind the camera again for this adaptation of the John Berendt novel about a murder in Savannah, Georgia. John Cusack ("Con Air") will play a journalist whose investigations lead him to a charismatic antique dealer ("L.A. Confidential's" Kevin Spacey), a local hustler (Jude Law, "Gattaca"), and a beautiful, free-spirited girl (Clint's daughter, Alison Eastwood, who appeared in "Absolute Power"). (Warner)

"MEET...THE DEEDLES" In this comedy, two surf-bum brothers (Paul Walker, "Pleasantville," and Steve Van Wormer, "Jingle All the Way") are sent to a boot camp in Yellowstone National Park by their millionaire father in order to teach them a lesson about survival. Dennis Hopper plays the camp's tough-as-nails leader. Hijinks ensue when the slackerly siblings are mistaken for park rangers. (Buena Vista)

"SPICE—THE MOVIE" Pop music's latest confection, the sassy, all-female, flavor-of-the-minute group The Spice Girls, will star in a musical comedy mockumentary in the vein of the Beatles' "A Hard Day's Night." Richard E. Grant ("Jack & Sarah") will co-star, and Bob Spiers (TV's "Absolutely Fabulous") will helm. (Columbia)

"FIDDLEFEST" Madonna ("Evita") will portray Roberta Tzavaris, a music teacher who developed a remarkable program to teach inner-city children to play the violin at Carnegie Hall concert level, in this fictionalized adaptation of last year's Academy Award-nominated documentary "Small Wonders." Wes Craven ("Scream") takes a break from the horror genre to direct this uplifting drama. (Miramax)

"OBJECT OF MY AFFECTION" This romantic comedy/drama will star Jennifer Aniston ("Picture Perfect") as a woman who rents a room in her apartment to a gay man (Paul Rudd, "Clueless") and subsequently falls in love with him. Stephen Baldwin ("Fled"), Tim Daly (TV's "Wings"), Alan Alda ("Everyone Says I Love You"), Nigel Hawthorne ("The Madness of King George") and Steve Zahn ("That Thing You Do!") will also star. Nicholas Hytner ("The Crucible") will direct. (Fox)

ET CETERA: Samuel L. Jackson has taken the lead in Gary Gray's "The Negotiator" as a hostage negotiator framed for murder (a role to which Sylvester Stallone was once attached). Kevin Spacey will co-star...Sean Connery will play the nemesis in Warner's "The Avengers," to star Ralph Fiennes as Jonathan Steed and Uma Thurman as Emma Peel...Eleven-year-old Miko Hughes ("Zeus and Roxanne") will play an autistic savant who breaks a top secret military code in Universal's "Simon," which stars Bruce Willis and Alec Baldwin...Director Alex Cox has left Rhino Films' Hunter S. Thompson biopic "Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas," and has been replaced by Terry Gilliam. Johnny Depp and Benicio Del Toro star.

ICONOCLASTS

Australian Native Sons MEL GIBSON and BRUCE DAVEY of ICON Bring It All Back Home

by Kim Williamson

Fourteen years ago, actor Mel Gibson was worried about the future of the Australian film industry. "Canada seems to have blown it. Australia could well do the same," he said. Gibson, who'd come to prominence with such Oz productions as "Mad Max," "Tim" and "Gallipoli," had just finished another Down Under effort, "The Year of Living Dangerously." On the bigscreen, the continent had also recently produced such hits as "My Brilliant Career," "'Breaker' Morant" and "The Man From Snowy River." But Gibson feared that, fueled by success, the country's production would expand too quickly, causing a ramp-up in costs that would lead to the industry's downfall.

Cut to a gray day in summer 1997. Whatever worries Gibson had about moviemaking Down Under seem to have dissipated like this morning's marine layer over the Warner Bros. lot, where Gibson's Icon Productions is housed in a two-level bungalow of offices. In a casually appointed suite, Gibson, as chairman and creative force of Icon, and Bruce Davey—who, drawing on his chartered accountant background, oversees the nine-year-old company's financial affairs as president and CEO—are talking about the company's future in an exclusive interview with BOXOFFICE. And the future at Icon seems busy and bright. In February 1996, Icon announced it had signed two major-studio production deals: a continuation of its original Warner pact, in place since January 1991, plus a new agreement with Paramount, domestic home of Icon's Oscar-winning "Braveheart." This past August, Icon entered into a three-year joint venture with Fox Filmed Entertainment to develop, produce and distribute films in Australia, using Fox's still-under-construction Fox Studios Australia in Sydney as home base.

"I think it's the same as it's always been," Gibson says of Australian filmmaking today. "Pretty much just really talented people operating on a shoestring, turning out quality stuff from time to time. Per capita, there's a lot of activity down there, even compared to the film community here. It's like a drop in the ocean, and yet they manage to more than fulfill a kind of populist quota."

In their yet-to-be-named Aussie venture—at the moment, just call it Mel & Murdoch, Inc.—headed by leading Down Under producer Timothy White ("Angel Baby," "Oscar and Lucinda"), the companies will work together on a yet-to-be-determined number of pictures. The films will be owned by Fox/Icon, with Fox distributing outside Australia. (Other Icon productions are copyright World Icon, an investment group originally formed to finance "Hamlet" when no studio would.)

"Our association with Fox came through 'Braveheart,'" Davey explains. "Fox took the foreign side of 'Braveheart.'"

"When Fox started to build their studio down there," Gibson adds, "it seemed like an opportune time to get into bed with these guys that we'd had such a good experience with."

But a sense of national pride was also involved. "I don't know whether Mel and I ever had the specific conversation," Davey says, "and if we didn't have it, it was most probably thought: that one day we'd like to give something back to Australia.

"I think it will be fabulous," Davey adds, speaking of the entire $120 million Fox effort. "There will be state-of-the-art soundstages and TV studios and theatrical studios. The first production there is underway—they're doing the sequel to 'Babe.' It's going to be great."

Gibson poses a question for his partner. "It's going to take a while for it to really wind up, isn't it?"

"Yeah," Davey replies.

"It always takes time," Gibson adds, nodding. "When we started Icon, we were at it for about three years before we got a shot off. It just takes a long time to generate things. But this is going to be very valuable, and I think a lot of good work's going to come out of there."

When it comes to discussing the specifics of Icon's involvement with Fox, the partners prove more reserved. "We have an office facility at the moment—not on the lot, but they will move," Davey says. "We have only three employees down there. They're identifying projects for us to jointly develop with Fox." As to what percentage of Icon projects will be shot in Australia, Davey says, "We can't say. After 'Braveheart' we did nothing for a couple of years. We aren't going to make a movie for the sake of making a movie, and you've no idea whether something's going to come along."

Presented with a hypothetical scenario, in which Icon would make a dozen movies between now and the year 2000, might a significant number be made in Australia? "We can only hope that that would be the case," Davey says carefully. But Gibson's response is equally interesting; almost to himself, he adds, "A dozen projects in three more years? It's possible!" He laughs, as if implying it's not probable. "The company would have to grow."

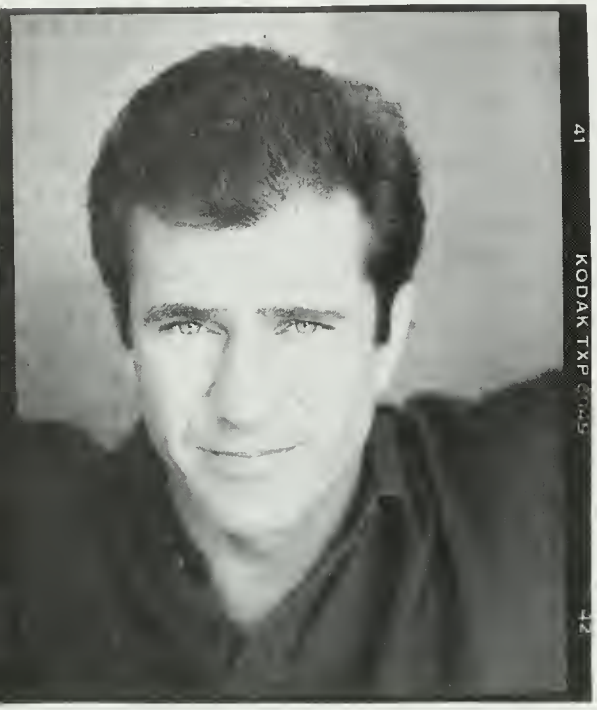
Fulfilling its Warner and Paramount pacts might demand exactly that: that Icon grow. Industry reports state Icon—which has made 12 films since its 1988 launch—will make four pictures for each studio over the next three years, with Gibson starring in one, directing another, and producing two more. "You know more than I do," Davey says, prompting more laughter from Gibson.

Both partners take a certain pride in not having a formal business plan. The uncertain availability of worthwhile projects is the cited reason. "The business dictates that in a lot of cases," Gibson says. "It's so fickle. You get things coming from left field and right field."

"I can give you an example," Davey adds. "We did 'Braveheart' and then we did nothing for almost two years. And then we found ourselves shooting three films on three separate continents at once." (Those are "Leo Tolstoy's Anna Karenina," released stateside by Warner this past April; "187," an urban drama opening via Warner in late July; and the charming "Fairy-Tale—A True Story," a family film Paramount has slated for October.) "Since those three films, it's been 12 months since we were physically shooting. With that sort of scenario, how can you possibly build a business plan?"

Without such a plan, will Icon meet its Warner and Paramount commitments—and develop fare for its Fox/Icon venture, and allow time for Gibson's extramural adventures, such as his new non-Icon thriller "Conspiracy Theory?" "You can only do your damn best, I think is the answer," Gibson says. "You might not get to four. But it won't be through lack of trying. You might get three—you might get five! You just have to keep looking all the time and developing ideas you think will work and see how they take hold."

Of the two studio deals, Gibson says, "Basically, it's our call, so it's up to us to get stuff to a stage where we're happy with it." Still, as Davey says, "They all want Mel Gibson projects," exemplified by Paramount's demand for at least one action picture to star him.



"You don't know what's going to work with what studio," Davey says. "It's no secret we took '187' to Paramount first, and they passed. And Warners picked it up. And what might not work for Warners might work for Paramount."

"You're a bit like the Fuller Brush man," Gibson adds. "You come to the house and you say, 'Hey, we got some of these, some of these, some of these, and these—what do you like, you like anything?' And he says, 'Yeah, the onion peeler. That's a good one.' They have to like it too. [After all,] we're not alone in this."

"It's a two-way street," Davey says. "It's not going to work if they're not sending us stuff, and it's not going to work if we're not sending them stuff. And we want it to work." Or, as Gibson puts it, "You just have to keep in mind your obligations, and try not to stiff anybody."

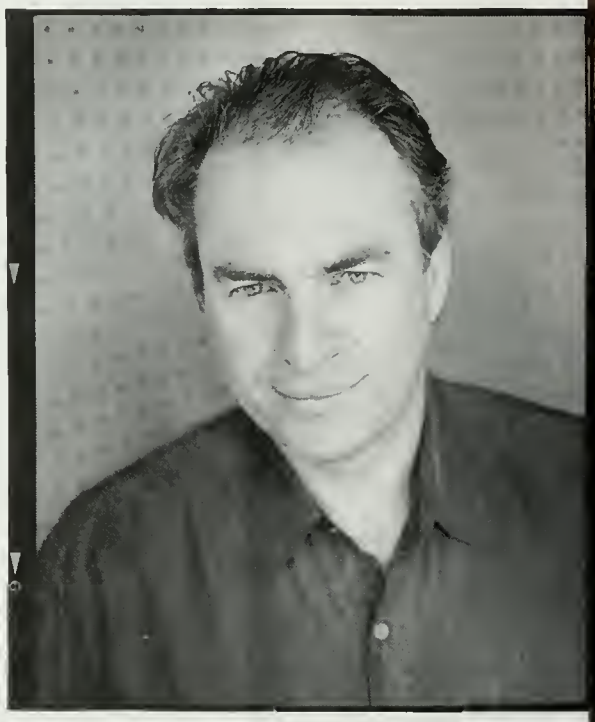
Along with its Australian and American ventures, Icon has entered a third continent: Europe. In September 1995, Icon Entertainment International was formed to handle overseas sales for Icon productions and third-party films in which the company takes an interest. The following month, it bought international rights to 20 films from the Kings Road library, including "All of Me," "The Big Easy" and "Jacknife." Located in London's Soho Square and run by former Lumiere managing director Ralph Kamp, Icon International this past fall also acquired Majestic Films, another London-based sales company, in a $10 million deal.

Previously, Majestic had handled foreign rights for certain Icon titles, counting among its 220-film library Icon's "The Man Without a Face" and "Immortal Beloved." Despite apparent duplication between Icon International and Majestic, Davey says the two will remain separate. "We're running them side by side. I think that it's appropriate to keep Icon for Icon films. Icon, I think, has earned a certain reputation." Majestic will handle "films that we're going to finance and other people are going to go and produce." The first such production is "Saint Ives," a Robert Louis Stevenson adaptation being made by Ireland's Little Bird.

The overseas effort was launched out of bottom-line pragmatism. "We [opened Icon International] because I figured out that what we were paying Majestic to handle our films would cover our overhead to do it ourselves," Davey says. "It then seemed prudent to try to cover the overhead of [the international] operation by library acquisitions, so that we weren't put in the position, like a lot of these sales companies are, of having to go out and find product. Once again, we don't want to make movies that we don't want to make, so you don't want to be selling movies for the sake of having to cover your overhead. Having a library is a foundation—it generates cash flow, which leaves you free to concentrate on fewer movies, and hopefully distribute them better, on the basis that less is more."

Two prominent film companies that, like Icon, made studio films for which they retained the copyright are/were Castle Rock and Cinergi. Both companies, while trying to grow their libraries from the inside, eventually had to sell out to conglomerates (respectively, Time Warner and Walt Disney Co.). On the other hand, on the morning of BOXOFFICE's visit to Icon, Wall Street sources were insisting that MGM—which like Icon has been making library deals, in its case to make itself more investor-attractive—is readying to go public via a late-1997 stock offering.

Neither selling stock to shareholders nor selling out to an entertainment giant interests Gibson and Davey. "I've talked to other guys who went public," Gibson says, "and it's been like a nightmare for them."



Davey agrees. "Those things are often put together by lawyers and accountants for their own reasons, and not for the benefit of the company." But wouldn't Icon love the access to virtually unlimited capital that a large corporate parent might provide? "Yes, but the interesting thing about the way we do our movies is that there is a discipline in the way that we work," Davey says. Which is this: Their sales experts define how much the market will invest in any particular production. "They come back and say, for example, 'We can raise $15 million.' So I say to my physical production guys, 'What's this going to cost me to make?' And they say, 'It's going to cost $20 million.' Well, you know it's not going to work. So you either come up with a way to make it for $15 million, or we can't do it. If someone said, 'Here's a pot of $100 million [to draw on],' people are going to lose sight of the discipline to make it work at $15 million. It's too easy to say, 'We'll just take $2 million from that hundred million.'"

Icon is no stranger to making rigorous budgetary decisions, even on works that are especially dear to Gibson and Davey's hearts. A story Gibson tells about shooting 'Braveheart' illustrates the point. The production was running low on time and money. "Literally, there was a place and a day near the end of the shoot where we did rip 12 pages out of the script. And it forced us on the creative side to be creative. Because we had to find a short cut there somehow. And we came up with something better than what was there in the first place."

Gibson and Davey hail from different continents—Gibson was born in Peekskill, N.Y., while Davey is a Down Under native—but their partnership of 17 years feels like a good one. Part of that is due to their shared Aussie sensibility; Gibson's family emigrated to Australia when he was 12, and he still maintains a ranch in the Australian Outback. As the 41-year-old has put it, "I formed my opinions in Australia."

The two men's different career abilities complement each other. "I'm a fiscal imbecile," Gibson says. "But Bruce is really good at that stuff. He's got a better overview for, like, business plans and situations than I do."

"The business plan that we don't have," Davey reminds him, laughing. "I think as time has gone on, Mel has exhibited this 'fiscal imbecility' of his, but he's not such an imbecile these days as he used to be." At that, it's Gibson's turn to laugh. "Vice versa: In terms of learning about creating things, I've learned a lot from Mel."

"But we both get snagged," Gibson says. "Every now and then, you just stand there and you think, 'Oh, man, we've just been done over,' or 'We came out the worst end of this deal,' or 'Gee, we won't do that again.' And it usually costs in some way, either financially or emotionally. We call it 'school fees,' which is a kind of good way to look at it." He chuckles. "I guess."

"We're still paying them," Davey laughs.

"Yeah," Gibson admits. "But we got a gold star along the way, here and there."

SEPTEMBER TRAILERS

It's a whole new ballgame as two new teams enter the fray

In the past year, Buena Vista, Paramount and Warner Bros. have said they'd be ramping down production and lessening their release slates. Although expected rampups from Columbia/TriStar and MGM/UA could help refill the lineup, that's a bit down the path, as new managements are still finding their footings. But two new major distributors—DreamWorks SKG and Polygram Filmed Entertainment Distribution—are heading to the plate right now.

And not only are they cleating in, in their first month of active operation they find themselves going head to head. Although Polygram gets in one free swing with Sept. 12's "The Game," two weeks later the Sept. 26 weekend finds Polygram's "The Gingerbread Man" batting against DreamWorks' "The Peacemaker" (see photo above). One might expect the naysayer studios to say something like "I told you so." And the new-against-new, and new-against-established, competition will only rise as time passes; DreamWorks is planning perhaps 10 releases annually, and Polygram is aiming toward a dozen.

Of course, aside from the one-on-one battle, film quality and audience turnout will be much watched for these rookie efforts from the two entities. The last major-league distributor to launch was TriStar back in 1984, when its first important title was the Robert Redford-starrer "The Natural," which hit a homer for the new studio. With these new players donning their mitts, one can expect this September to be an especially hot Indian Summer.

Intimate Relations

This black comedy focuses on a 1950s picture-perfect family, whose lives are disrupted when mom (Julie Walters) seduces a vulnerable young lodger ("Different for Girls'" Rupert Graves). Philip Goodhew directs and scripts; Angela Hart, Lisa Hope and Handmade head Jon Slan produce. (Fox Searchlight, 9/5)

Exploitips: Our Seattle fest reviewer gave this "relentlessly bleak film" two stars but cited Walters' and Graves' work as commendable. The subject ("blackmail, twisted sexual mores, and unrequited love") has a salable salaciousness, and a date move from 5/9 means no studio competition.

Mouth to Mouth

In this Spanish screwball comedy, Victor ("Jamon, Jamon's" Javier Bardem) takes a job at a phone sex service only to become involved with a client ("A Walk in the Clouds'" Aitana Sanchez-Gijon) and her husband. Manuel Gomez Pereira directs, and he scripts with Joaquin Oristrell, Juan Luis Iborra and Naomi Wise; Benitez, Oristrell and Pereira produce. (Miramax, 9/5 NY/LA)

Exploitips: "Mouth to Mouth" was slated for 6/21/96, then 9/6/96, then 6/6/97 and now 9/5/97. Hmm. Yet emphasizing the Bardem and Sanchez-Gijon credits should draw the experienced art-house crowd, and as with "Intimate Relations" the salaciousness factor could kick in.

Gravesend

In this dark comedy, when someone is accidentally killed, four troubled friends in trying to rid themselves of the body experience wild encounters, petty theft and dissension. Salvatore Stabile directs, writes and produces. (Manga, 9/5 NY)

Exploitips: The odd title and under-20 storyline could capture the interest of young males looking for escape from the new school year (the film having moved from August). This is a step outside the manga genre for Manga, which has specialized in SF-bent Japanese animation.

SEPTEMBER 12

A Thousand Acres

Based on Jane Smiley's Pulitzer winner, this drama follows a family's unraveling when a father (Jason Robards) distributes his farmland among his three daughters. Jessica Lange, Michelle Pfeiffer, Jennifer Jason Leigh and Keith Carradine also star. Jocelyn Moorhouse directs; Laura Jones scripts. (Buena Vista, 9/12)

Exploitips: This "King Lear" variant boasts an exploitable bookstore tie, especially given that, just as "The Game" (see P. 16) should draw males, "A Thousand Acres" should pull book-friendly females.

Fire Down Below

Steven Seagal saves the environment again in this actioner about an EPA agent who goes undercover. Marg Helgenberger, Kris Kristofferson and Harry Dean Stanton co-star. Felix Alcala directs; Jeb Stuart scripts; Seagal and Julius R. Nasso produce. (Warner, 9/12)

Exploitips: Experience might count. Polygram's "The Game" has a higher star profile, with the boxoffice wane of Seagal, but Warner has long-standing relationships with the circuits. It's a duel to the death, with both films going after the same male demo.

The Locusts

This dark drama set in 1960 rural Kansas stars Vince Vaughn, Jeremy Davies (also in "Going All the Way") and Ashley Judd. John Patrick Kelly directs and scripts; MPCA's Brad Krevoy and Steve Stabler produce with Bradley Thomas. (Orion Classics, 9/12 ltd)

Exploitips: In the large markets in which "The Locusts" opens, this could be the date-night option for couples who can't agree on the weekend's three studio films. To draw them, hype the ensemble.

B. Monkey

Wild young beauty B (Italian starlet Asia Argento, of "Queen Margot") is the object of passion of a romantic schoolteacher ("I Shot Andy Warhol's" Jared Harris). Michael Radford ("The Postman") directs; Andrew Davies adapts his novel with Michael Thomas; Stephen Woolley and Colin Vaines produce. (Miramax, 9/12)

Exploitips: Moved from 7/18, "B. Monkey" seems the weekend's prime art-house candidate. The hip young will come for Argento; the older specialized crowd will bet on Radford.

Kicked in the Head

Kevin Corrigan (also in "Bandwagon") stars as a hapless gent caught among crime and new/old girlfriends. Linda Fiorentino, James Woods, Michael Rapaport and Lili Taylor co-star. Corrigan co-scripts with director Matthew Harrison; Barbara De Fina produces. (October, 9/12 NY/LA, 9/19 exp)

THE GAME

"Seven" director David Fincher brings his dark sensibilities to this urban thriller about a shrewd businessman (Michael Douglas) accustomed to being in control. Then comes an unexpected birthday present from his charming but irresponsible brother (Sean Penn). That present changes everything, involving the businessman in a deadly game. Deborah Unger and Armin Mueller-Stahl co-star. John Brancato & Michael Ferris ("The Net" duo) and Andrew Kevin Walker (also "Seven") script; Steve Golin and Cean Chaffin produce for Propaganda. (Polygram, 9/12)

Exploitips: This is the first release from new stateside distributor Polygram Filmed Entertainment, which plans to handle a dozen or so titles annually. The Penn and Douglas names, plus the Fincher credit, promise substantial male-demo turnout. Expect distributor hype to focus on "Seven," with dark visual support from trailers. Douglas says, "Some days I would look at the video monitor and ask, "'Is there a light missing?' But no, there was no light missing."

Exploitips: This bears a Martin Scorsese exec prod seal, but it demands one buy Fiorentino falling for Corrigan, an event that would require his scripting. This is more bi-gender than the male-leaning "Suicide Kings."

Suicide Kings

In this black comedy, four collegians nab a retired mobster (Christopher Walken) to help them. Denis Leary (also in "Wide Awake"), Henry Thomas, Sean Patrick Flanery and Jay Mohr also star. Peter O'Fallon directs; Wayne Rice and Gina Goldman script; Rice produces with Morrie Eisenman. (Live, 9/12)

Exploitips: Orion's "8 Heads in a Duffel Bag" didn't ignite the boxoffice this spring, but the players here have more experience. If they strike sparks, this could build word of mouth.

Bandwagon

Four kids form a rock band and hit the road in this slacker rock n' roll comedy/road movie. Kevin Corrigan stars. John Schultz ("The Making of Jurassic Park") directs and scripts, and produces with Alyson Poole. (CFP, 9/12)

Exploitips: Once 8/15, this like "Gravesend" could draw school-disaffected youths.

SEPTEMBER 19

In and Out

Kevin Kline stars as a popular HS teacher whose life is upset when his sexuality is called into question on national TV the night before his wedding. Joan Cusack and Matt Dillon co-star. Frank Oz ("The Indian in the Cupboard") directs; Paul Rudnick ("Addams Family Values") scripts; Scott Rudin ("The First Wives Club") produces. (Paramount, 9/19)

Exploitips: Moved from 6/13, this comedy/drama has a salable cast and good behind-the-camera credits. It's the weekend's single studio release, so this seems to have a clear path to mainstream audiences.

Wide Awake

A 10-year-old boy confronts the death of his grandfather by searching for God in this spiritual comedy/drama. Denis Leary, Dana Delany, Rosie O'Donnell and Joseph Cross star. M. Night Shyamalan ("Praying With Anger") directs and scripts; Cary Woods and Cathy Conrad produce. (Miramax, 9/19)

Exploitips: Thanks to her smash TV talk show, O'Donnell probably has the widest cast profile with mainstream audiences, which Miramax hopes will come here. Before their recent split, Woods and Conrad produced a number of critically acclaimed films.

Going All the Way

In this romantic comedy/drama, two Korean War vets return looking for meaning and love. Jeremy Davies, Ben Affleck, "Scream's" Rose McGowan, Amy Locane and Rachel Weisz star. Mark Pellington directs; Dan Wakefield adapts his novel; Tom Gorai and Sigurjon Sighvatsson produce. (Gramercy, 9/19 ltd)

Exploitips: Against an expanding "Kicked in the Head" for good-times youth auds, this period piece could be at a minor disadvantage, and the teenybopper title won't help. Still, it has a solid cast and the Sighvatsson name, so expect moderately good numbers.

The Myth of Fingerprints

This dramatic comedy has a New England family struggling with changes over one difficult Thanksgiving weekend. Blythe Danner, Hope Davis, Julianne Moore, Roy Scheider and Noah Wyle star. Bart Freundlich directs and scripts, and produces with Mary Jane Skalski and Tim Pereli. See our Sneak Preview in this issue. (Sony Classics, 9/19 NY)

Exploitips: "Home for the Holidays" didn't work with mainstream audiences, and this month's "The Ice Storm" covers similar terrain. Still, this sounds like promising art-house fare.

SEPTEMBER 26

The Peacemaker

George Clooney ("Batman & Robin") stars as an intelligence officer and Nicole Kidman as head of a White House nuclear smuggling group. The two must put aside conflicting styles of operation when a terrorist gets a warhead to use on the U.N. Mimi Leder (TV's "E.R.") directs; Michael Schiffer ("Crimson Tide") scripts. (See P. 14 photo.) (Dreamworks, 9/26)

Exploitips: Given his Batman and "One Fine Day" turns, Clooney is salable as a rising star, and Kidman is a known quantity, making this a choice for more mature demos.

The Edge

This psychological thriller from Lee Tamahori ("Once Were Warriors") stars Anthony Hopkins as a wealthy intellectual and Alec Baldwin as a fashion photographer who covets Hopkins' wife ("Sirens'" Elle Macpherson). Yet the two must work together when their plane crashes in the remote Alaskan wilderness. David Mamet scripts. (Fox, 9/26)

Exploitips: The elements are there: Taut performer Baldwin and edgy scripter Mamet could bring the sometimes hammy Hopkins into sharp focus—and return Tamahori from the descent of "Mulholland Falls." Expect the genre and leads (& Macpherson) to draw male.

The Gingerbread Man

Kenneth Branagh ("Hamlet") stars as a lawyer enlisted by a female client to win control over her father's estate. The story is based on a John Grisham novel, with Grisham adapting and Robert Altman directing. Jeremy Tanenbaum produces. (Polygram, 9/26)

Exploitips: The cool response to Grisham adaptation "The Chamber" gives pause. Plus, Polygram's second release is going against DreamWorks #1, though not as much as "The Edge" does in demo. The cast is good, and the Altman name is gold with his fans.

Breaking Up

Russell Crowe ("Rough Magic") and Salma Hayek ("Fools Rush In") star in this romance about a fotog and a teacher certain they've found perfect love—until they face the ups and downs of real life. Robert Greenwald ("Hear No Evil") directs, and produces with George Moffly; Michael Cristofer scripts. (Warner, 9/26)

Every Day Millions of People Look Down on Us

Beltrac® Public Guidance Systems… Versatile, Beautiful, Adaptable.

As the premier world supplier of outstanding quality and innovative public guidance and hospitality products since 1979, we get around. In stores, theaters, banks, hotels, airports . . . just about any place where efficient guidance and direction of the public is important, you'll find people looking down on our Lavi Beltrac logo. After all, there are some pretty good reasons why Lavi is the leader in public guidance.

Versatile – Beltrac's integrated design conceals the retractable belt within the post. So there are no easily damaged parts or receptacles. Its patented 4-way post assures that one post will work for every possible configuration without costly add-ons.

Beautiful – Four metallic finishes, and a variety of Lido-Tone powder-coated post colors, combined with 15 belt colors give the designer a broad palette for any project. The 6'-8" belts provide highly visible space for printed messages or company identification and integrated sign frames complete your messaging options.

Adaptable – Beltrac portable posts offer an answer to the ever changing needs of public guidance, with wall-to-wall and post-to-post configurations. Of course, when your interior requirements call for solid brass or chrome posts with velour ropes, our Traditional line is second to none.

All systems are designed, engineered and manufactured in the United States.

Exploitips: A Seattle fest fave, "Breaking Up" has a couples-pleasing narrative and attractive leads, if not A-listers. Expect date-nighters skewing younger than "The Peacemaker."

The Ice Storm

Based on Rick Moody's novel, this drama finds two New England families at sexual crossroads during Thanksgiving 1973. Kevin Kline, Sigourney Weaver, Christina Ricci, Joan Allen and Elijah Wood star. Ang Lee ("Sense and Sensibility") directs; James Schamus scripts and produces. (Fox Searchlight, 9/26)

Exploitips: With four successful films under his belt, Lee has moved from the art-house to the mainstream, and here the known cast will provide marquee support. "The Ice Storm" drew fine notices at Cannes, useful in garnering the attention of the likely mature demo.

Little City

Six friends make their relationshps complex when they add sex to the scenario. Jon Bon Jovi, Penelope Ann Miller, Annabella Sciorra, Josh Charles and Joanna Going star. Roberto Benabib directs and scripts; Beau Flynn, Stefan Simchowitz, Ron Wechsler and Jeffrey L. Davidson produce. (Miramax, 9/26)

Exploitips: Miramax acquired this for a reported $2.8 million, a good price for this level of cast, which boasts salable names to go along with its Gen X-friendly storyline.

Gummo

"Kids" scripter Harmony Korine directs and scripts another tale of bored youth. Chloe Sevigny ("Kids") and Max Perlich star. Cary Woods ("Kids") produces. (Fine Line, 9/26)

Exploitips: Once slated for 5/16, "Gummo" still faces a tough weekend. Play up the "Kids" connections to draw media attention.

Stag

When a stripper is accidentally killed at a bachelor party, the men argue over what to do. Andrew McCarthy and Mario Van Peebles star. Gavin Wilding directs; Evan Tylor and Pat Burmell script; John Dunning and Michael Pasearnek produce. (CFP, 9/26 ltd)

Exploitips: Women aren't likely ticketeers, and the narrative isn't male-friendly. A come-hither tagline like "'Stag'—what the men keep secret" could partly solve both problems.

Omaha: the movie

A Husker returns from Nepal to a comic hometown situation. Hughston Walkinshaw stars. Dan Mirvish directs and scripts, and produces with Dana Altman. (Movieworld, 9/26)

Exploitips: This made a decently received regional tour last year via Bugeater Releasing.

SEPT. UNDATED

The End of Violence

Wim Wenders ("Wings of Desire") helms this L.A. drama in which characters connect via violence. Andie MacDowell, Gabriel Byrne, Bill Pullman and Peter Horton star.

LATE MOVIE MOVES...

G.I. Jane

Demi Moore faces male anger as the first female Navy Seals candidate. Ridley Scott directs; David Twohy and Danielle Alexandra script; Scott and Moore produce with Roger Birnbaum and Suzanne Todd. (Buena Vista, 8/15)

Exploitips: "G.I. Jane" should grab media attention, given recent gender scandals.

Dark City

In this SF thriller, a man learns his memories are implants. Rufus Sewell, William Hurt, Kiefer Sutherland and Jennifer Connelly star. Alex Proyas ("The Crow") directs and co-scripts. See our June '97 Sneak Preview. (New Line, 8/29)

Exploitips: Moved from 9/19 to grab Labor Day, "Dark City" should attract the more serious SF set (others opting for Universal's same-date "Kull"). Highlight Proyas' "Crow" credit.

Trojan Eddie

Stephen Rea plays a crook who crosses his boss (Richard Harris). Gillies Mackinnon ("The Playboys") directs; Billy Roche scripts; Emma Burge produces. (Castle Hill, 8/29 NY, Sept. LA)

Exploitips: The known cast is likely to attract art-housers, as is the Mackinnon name.

Dogs

Four broke Lower East Side roommates open a sports betting den. Toby Huss and Pam Columbus star. Eve Annenberg directs, scripts and co-produces. (Phaedra, Aug)

Exploitips: Hype as "'Clerks' for Chicks."

Fire

This romantic drama is the first film from India about lesbianism. Sahbana Azmi and Nandita Das star. Deepa Mehta ("Camilla") directs and scripts. (Zeitgeist, 8/22 NY)

Exploitips: See our 7/97 3 1/2-star review.

Kiss and Tell

This improvised comedy is about a crazie who kills with carrots. Rose McGowan ("Scream") co-stars. Jordan Alan ("Terminal Bliss") directs and scripts. (Phaedra, Aug)

Exploitips: Highlight "Scream"er McGowan.

The Keeper

A law officer/law student is caught between two worlds. Giancarlo Esposito and African great Isaach de Bankole star. (Kino, Aug)

Exploitips: Hype the two leads.

Sleepy Heads

Young Japanese move to New York. Yoshifumi Hosoya helms & co-scripts. (Phaedra, Aug)

Exploitips: This Asian-language fare could play with young immigrant populations.

The Delta

A rich white kid falls for an immigrant black Vietnamese. (Strand, 8/1 NY, 8/15 LA)

Exploitips: Expect some gay-aud turnout.

Nicholas Klein scripts; Wenders, Klein and Deepak Nayar produce. (UA, Sept)

Exploitips: This pulled middling reviews at Cannes (see our review, this issue), but the Wenders name and the eclectic cast will likely draw specialized audiences.

Cousin Bette

Tony winner Des McAnuff helms this Honore de Balzac adaptation. Jessica Lange and Elisabeth Shue star. Lynn Siefert and Susan Tarr script; Sarah Radclyffe and Philip Carcassone produce. (Fox Searchlight, Sept)

Exploitips: Expect "Love! Valour! Compassion!" numbers, but via the distaff demo.

The Assignment

In this espionage thriller, a U.S. naval officer (Aidan Quinn) must pretend to be an infamous terrorist. Donald Sutherland and Ben Kingsley co-star. Christian Duguay directs; Dan Gordon and Sabi H. Shabtai script; Tom Berry and Franco Battista produce. (Triumph, Sept)

Exploitips: Once 4/25, before Triumph's announced demise, this should draw a Seagal crowd, if in fewer numbers due to "Face/Off" similarities and lesser star power.

Self Made Hero

Fame and lies figure In this French comedy/drama version of a Jean-Francois Denlau novel. Mathieu Kassovitz ("La Haine") stars. Jacques Audlard directs. (Strand, Sept)

Exploitips: Emphasize the setting and eras to attract art-house Francophiles.

Love Always

A young woman heads cross-country to meet a former amour who has proposed. Marisa Ryan stars. Jude Pauline Eberhard directs and co-scripts. (Legacy, Sept)

Exploitips: A distaff road movie: That scenario and the romance could catch the eye of teenaged and twentysomething gals.

Latin Boys Go to Hell

This gay love story is set in Brooklyn. Irwin Ossa, John Bryant Davila and Guinevere Turner ("Go Fish") co-star. Ela Troyano directs and co-scripts; Jurgen Bruning ("Hustler White") produces. (Strand, mid-Sept NY/LA)

Exploitips: Once 7/25, this has played fests, so look for exploitable critical quotes.

Eye of God

Martha Plimpton and Kevin Anderson star in a tale of love, murder and fundamentalism. Tim Blake Nelson helms and adapts his play; Wendy Ettinger & Michael Nelson produce. (Castle Hill)

Exploitips: Look for positive New York notices to support later openings.

Nenette et Boni

In this French-language drama, a brother and sister reunite when she becomes pregnant. Gregoire Colin and Alice Houri star. Claire Denis scripts and co-directs; Georges Benayoun produces. (Strand, mid-Sept)

Exploitips: Like "Self Made Hero," "Nenette et Boni" is for the Francophilic art-house set.

Timeless

A crook and a gangster girlfriend seek a better life. Chris Hart directs and scripts, and produces with Patricia Bice. (Phaedra, Sept)

Exploitips: This experimental film played at Sundance to gleanable art-house quotes.

Nights of Cabiria

This is a reissue of Federico Fellini's 1957 Italian romance/drama. (Strand, Sept)

Exploitips: Once planned for summer, this like "Self Made Hero" is for the established art-house set. The sell is Fellini.

Twisted

This is a gay take on "Oliver Twist." Writer/director Seth Michael Donsky produces with Adrian Agramonte. (Leisure Time, Sept)

Exploitips: Moved from June, "Twisted" will play best in gay-demo urban areas.

Capitaine Conan

This French rerelease is from director Bertrand Tavernier. (Kino, Sept)

Exploitips: This was featured at Seattle's Tavernier retrospective, so look for new quotes.

In a Strange City

A Taiwanese teacher has an affair with a politician. Kuei-men Yang and Winston Chao star. Chi Yin directs (Filmopolis, Sept)

Exploitips: See our 7/96 3 1/2-star review, which calls Yang's turn sublime.

"MYTH" ADVENTURE

Actress Julianne Moore theorizes about "The Myth of Fingerprints"

by Michael Payne

In an era in which actresses often say good roles are few and far between, Julianne Moore seems to nimbly leap from one interesting character to another. In recent years, she's played a guilt-ridden artist in Robert Altman's "Short Cuts," a beguiling Yelena in Louis Malle's "Vanya on 42nd Street," a woman with a biological clock ticking in Chris Columbus' "Nine Months" and a neurotically allergic housewife in Todd Haynes' "Safe." Earlier this summer, she was seen on 6,000 screens at once portraying an ambitious paleontologist in "The Lost World: Jurassic Park." Also slated for this summer is New Line's "Boogie Nights," a dark comedy about the 1970s porn industry, in which she plays an adult film star named Amber Waves.

Her next film returns her to the world of the independents and to Sony Clasics, which handled "Vanya on 42nd Street" and "Safe." "The Myth of Fingerprints" is a drama about a family forced to confront hidden truths. Her character, Mia—whom Moore describes as "a very angry, disenfranchised person who doesn't fit into her family"—is the key to unlocking those truths. "'The Myth of Fingerprints' is about four adults who come home for Thanksgiving," Moore says. "It's about a dysfunctional family. It's a family where, for all appearances' sake, everything is normal, everyone seems pretty happy—but as you spend time with them you learn that there's something extremely wrong between them and their father."

The film co-stars Roy Scheider as her troubled dad, Blythe Danner as her mother, Noah Wyle as a younger brother, Brian Kerwin as her therapist lover, and James LeGros (who co-starred in "Safe") as a childhood friend she hasn't seen since kindergarten. Moore says the film is an ensemble piece that veers from uproarious comedy to poignant drama. "It really runs the spectrum," she says. "It's wonderful that way. It's very funny—but it's also pretty painful."

Asked if the transition from bright comedy to dark drama is a difficult one to make, Moore responds, "Not really—not if the script is well-written, which this one is. As long as the text is there, as long as the material is strong, it's not difficult to do. It's only hard to do when the script's bad. But 'The Myth of Fingerprints' is a very beautiful, interesting, original script written and directed by Bart Freundlich."

Moore's appraisal of the project might seem biased—not only does she star in it, she and Freundlich are romantically linked—but the folks at Sony Classics do agree with her opinion. The film is Freundlich's feature directing debut, and the script was strong enough to persuade Sony Classics, a company that traditionally finances only pictures helmed by experienced filmmakers, to let the first-timer have his shot.

The film's mysterious title is taken from a song by Paul Simon. In it, the "myth" is that, while everyone believes they are unique individuals—as unique as fingerprints—in truth all human beings have more in common with each other than their differences might reflect. "I think [the film] is going to be identifiable for anyone who has a family," Moore says. "That's where the humor is." And it's that ability of audiences to identify with characters onscreen that makes cinema so powerful, Moore asserts. "I think that the reason film is so accessible as a medium is that people are able to recognize themselves in very human problems within a film. Films are 'relatable' in that sense."

Even a work like "Boogie Nights," which takes place in the porn industry, has a universality, Moore says. "Those characters work in a world that may be alien to a lot of people, but they're dealing with very familiar problems. My character is a mother who lost her son. She's somebody that I would describe as well-intentioned but extremely self-deluded. That's something people see in life and something you can sympathize with."

But such good roles can indeed be hard to come by. Moore believes the absence of well-written characters isn't just a problem for women, though. "There is a lack of good roles, period," she says. "There aren't that many great roles for men, either. It's not that you see a role for a man and say, 'Gee, I wish this was a woman—why couldn't I play that?' There is a dearth of great parts, and that springs from what's happening in mainstream films. We have these concept-driven pictures that are more about the event than about the characters."

Yet Moore doesn't demean such movies; after all, she did star in an event film that made nearly $100 million during its first weekend. "I was thrilled to work with Steven Spielberg on a movie like that, of that genre," she says of "The Lost World." "You have to be aware of what kind of film you're working in. I like all the characters that were created in ["The Lost World"]. I think they are all kind of fun and added a human element." With a laugh, Moore adds, "But also, conversely, it is a story about dinosaurs."

Moore has been taking the summer off, having managed to complete yet another film set for a 1997 release. Coming in December from Gramercy, "The Big Lebowski" is written and directed by the Coen Brothers and co-stars Jeff Bridges, John Goodman and Steve Buscemi. Moore describes it as "a mistaken identity caper—sort of the Coen Brothers' version of 'The Big Sleep.'" Adding to her myriad collection of roles, Moore plays "a very eccentric painter" in the verbal comedy. When reminded that the last Coen film, "Fargo," netted an Academy Award for its lead actress, Frances McDormand, Moore simply rolls her eyes and says, "You don't think about those things." ■

"The Myth of Fingerprints." Starring Julianne Moore, Roy Scheider and Blythe Danner. Directed and written by Bart Freundlich. Produced by Tim Perell and Mary Jane Skalski. A Sony Classics release. Drama. Rated R for sexuality and language. Opens Sept. 19 NY.

CINEMA AUSTRALIA

A Look at the Australian Market's Present and Future

by Robert Manson
Managing Director, The Greater Union Organisation

For years Australian film exhibitors have faced increasing competition from a great variety of new technologies and leisure facilities. These challenges have proved cathartic for our industry, resulting in radical improvements to the clarity and precision of projection and sound equipment, as well as to the comfort and ergonomics of cinema design and fitout. Part of this change was the provision of the multi-choice environment of multiplexes. All major exhibitors here, including Greater Union, Village Roadshow and Hoyts, now have multiplexes at the hub of their operations in city, suburban and regional locations, as well as in off-shore developments.

Talk of megaplexes currently occupies the Australian marketplace and is being realized either through add-ons of several screens to existing multiplexes or through the construction of new megaplexes in traditional suburban and regional activity hubs. Exhibitors here are also looking at the Entertainment Destination concept emerging from success stories overseas where cinemas form the anchor of a unique environment of amusements, rides, lifestyle retailing stores, themed restaurants and bars.

A recent survey of cinemagoers in Australia revealed their five top priorities as: (1.) extensive choice of movies; (2.) comfortable seats; (3.) top quality picture and sound; (4.) quality food and drink; (5.) provision of parking. Based on these results it is clear that cinemagoers of the '90s expect and demand new-millennium technology in sophisticated surrounds with a wide choice of movies and a full range of facilities at their fingertips.

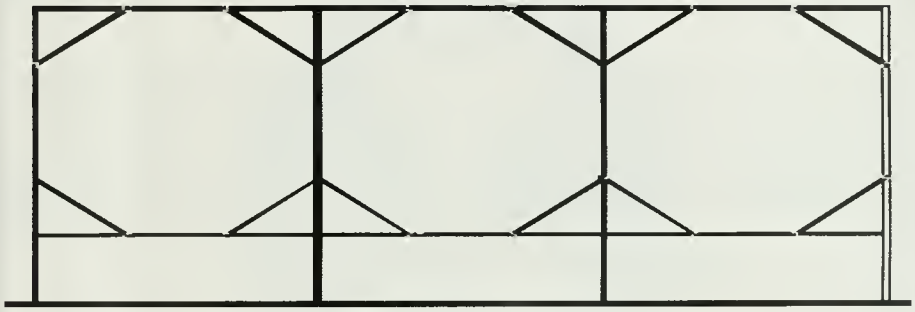
With these factors in mind, local exhibitors are upgrading multiplexes to accommodate as many as another eight, 10 or 12 auditoriums. Current analysis indicates that megaplexes attract around 100,000 persons per screen per annum, resulting in an average annual attendance to a medium-sized megaplex of around two million customers. The popularity, functionality and cost effectiveness of the megaplex are factors likely to confirm its status as the preferred format for future cinema screen development around Australia.

On the local scene, last year the joint venture partnership among Greater Union, Village Roadshow and Warner Bros. International announced the doubling of its Australian circuit, to be spearheaded by the development of megaplexes with seating capacities of approximately 5,000 each. These are in addition to add-ons to existing multiplexes in all major cities.

Village Roadshow sees exhibition as its biggest business and key to the future, to the point of striving to be "the best Exhibition group in the known universe," to quote Managing Director Graham Burke. Either independently or as part of their international joint venture with Warner Bros., Village Roadshow now has well over 300 multiplex screens around the world in addition to its Australian screens.

Village Roadshow's part owner, part partner and biggest domestic competitor Greater Union has built synergistic businesses around its exhibition core that have brought both strength and stability. Greater Union ranks as the largest of Australia's three major exhibitors, and has maintained and increased its domestic lead since 1991 despite challenges from the expansion of Hoyts and Village Roadshow.

Greater Union has 148 multiplex screens to date in CBD and suburban locations with more underway. The Group has a further 139 screens in traditional cinema houses varying from singles to six-plexes. These give Greater Union 287 screens around Australia, in addition to 80 owned, leased and/or operated in conjunction with Village Roadshow and Warner Bros. and others. Over the next 18 months the Greater Union Group has scheduled the addition of 300 screens nationally in conjunction with Village and Warner Bros. The scope of the combined domestic cinema expansion programs suggest the probability of market saturation in the next few years.



Competition for suitable sites is becoming quite fierce. All major Australian exhibitors are already engaged in overseas expansion programs in Europe, the Middle East, Asia and Latin America to offset the effects of eventual home market saturation and to reap the benefits of lucrative foreign exhibition opportunities. Greater Union's international arm foresees operating some 350 international screens in the run up to the year 2000, while Village Roadshow, partially in joint venture with Warner Bros., aims to have 3,000 screens worldwide by 2001. Hoyts, already a major player in the U.S., is also looking at other overseas markets.

Overseas expansion is not a cure-all for domestic over-servicing and saturation. This problem must be faced at home. Although targeted ad campaigns to improve market profile and to foster brand loyalty play a part in increasing market share, the key to success in Australian exhibition is fourfold: (1.) being in the smartest location; (2.) building multiplexes with room to grow into megaplexes and beyond; (3.) recognizing that cinema is only a part of the entertainment equation; (4.) providing as much of the remaining equation as possible through one's own resources.

The most noteworthy new venture for Australia is the development of the largest cinema center in the world. This 30-screen megaplex is a joint venture between Greater Union and Village/Warner Bros. and is currently being constructed in the South Australian capital, Adelaide, as part of the largest Westfield retail development in the country. When it opens in September 1997, the megaplex will feature 30 auditoriums of differing sizes ranging from 102-seat cinemas to 544 seats with screens in proportion to cinema size. All eyes will be focused on this development as a gauge of 21st century movie-going trends.

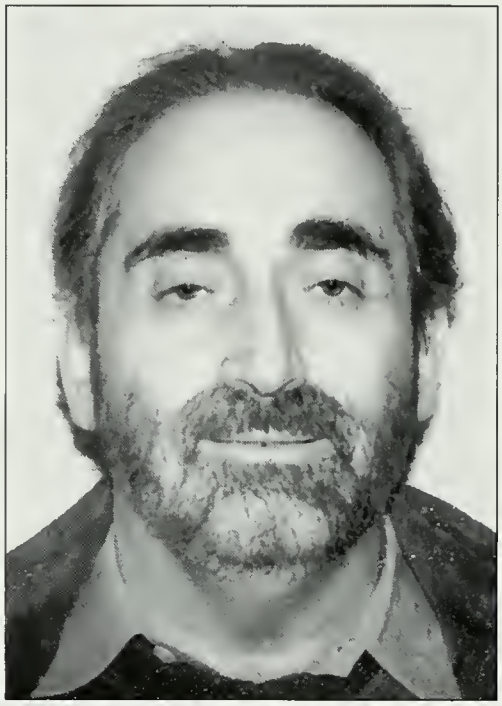
AUSTRALIA: DISTRIBUTOR'S DREAM OR NIGHTMARE?

A Personal View of Australia from the Distribution Side—Part Dream, Part Nightmare and Always Interesting



by Michael Selwyn
Managing Director, UIP Australia

There is a country where, in 1985, audiences went to the cinema 30 million times, an average per head of 1.9 visits per year. There was 1 screen for every 31,000 people and the boxoffice was US$121.6 million. In this country in 1996, audiences went to the cinema 74 million times, an average per head of 4.1 visits per year. There is now 1 screen for every 14,000 people with more being built and the boxoffice for the year was US$408 million.

Surely this is a distributor's dream and we have all gone to heaven.

Well, let's think about another country. Release costs are high and getting higher which makes the economics of a medium scale release a pretty uncertain endeavor. All the multiplexes are too small, which means that most films are fighting for sessions even on opening day and the rental terms are amongst the lowest in the known world.

Spare us from this nightmare.

Australia finds itself with a very large number of multiplexes. Many are very close to their neighbors, most have six to 10 screens and we have a fairly serious problem in coping with the large number of films looking for release.

Of course, both descriptions refer to Australia and the truth, as ever, is a combination of the differing points of view that you want to put forward.

When the multiplex revolution came to Australia, the first multiplexes were not very well designed—flat floors, aisles down the middle—and above all, they were built with six to eight screens. Also, most of the houses were of the same size. The design of the multiplexes slowly improved but even as late as 1994 or '95 there was very little stadium seating and the screen numbers still hovered around eight or 10 in a couple of locations. Distributors crying out for more screens per site were accorded about the same respect as some of the more grumpy Old Testament prophets. The result of all this is that Australia finds itself with a very large number of multiplexes. Many are very close to their neighbors, most have six to 10 screens and we have a fairly serious problem in coping with the large number of films looking for release.

However, all is not gloom. All exhibitors have seen huge success with their recent openings. Large multiplexes—12 screens in the first phase with more planned—with stadium seating, large screens and digital sound continue to show how keen the audience is for the "total cinema experience" style of the late 1990s. Buoyed by this, many sites have plans for additional mega-screens, and it seems now an accepted fate that 14 to 16 screens is a minimum to do business properly, with a couple of sites suggested for 24 or even more. The logic has been accepted, as has been seen in other locations such as Brussels in Belgium, that 24 screens is simply three times bigger than 8, PROVIDED you have the dedicated population.

So, assuming that the best locations are going to expand to 14 or 16 screens, what happens to the others? There is, to me, a clear solution that is vital to the growth of the theatrical business in Australia. We have to move forwards with the creation of a discount-house circuit and use these locations for that purpose. This will enable the exhibitors to expand their best locations to cope with the oversupply of film. They will be able to hold solid film longer to take advantage of subsequent weeks' terms and they will create a new window in the exhibition market to the advantage of everybody, including the consumer.

So, that's the Australian market: part dream, part nightmare and, in all ways, headed toward an interesting future.

THE UPSIDE FROM DOWN UNDER

A Look at Australia's Booming Exhibition Industry

by Susan Lambert

CONVENTION CONNECTIONS: MPEAQ president Richard Parton and wife, Lyn, with Paul Johnson, managing director of Hoyts, Sydney enjoy the 1996 Australian Movie Convention. (NOEL BENTLEY)

Australia is a continent of contrasts. From the harsh stretches of desolate country outback to the surfers' and sunworshipers' paradise of the golden coasts; from the high rises and high culture of Sydney to the isolated islands of the great barrier reef, there is no one defining image of the land down under. And yet there is, to the world at large, a unique Australian sensibility. Something born of strength and beauty, something intrinsically connected to land and place, something adventurous, witty and undefinably bold. There is something so perfectly cinematic about the place and the people that movies have always been an important flashpoint for defining, and sometimes creating, the culture (think "'Crocodile' Dundee," "Mad Max," "The Man From Snowy River," "Strictly Ballroom," "Priscilla, Queen of the Desert," "Muriel's Wedding," "Babe" and this year's "Shine," just to name a few).

For going on 90 years, Australia has been considered by most to be a dominant force in Pacific Rim distribution and exhibition. As this year's annual Australian Movie Convention commences, the industry faces down the coming millennium with aggressive expansion, savvy marketing and high hopes.

The country of 18.3 million people currently supports 1,265 screens and counting. At the present rate of expansion, some screen count estimates put the number as high as 2,000 by the year 2000. Everyone agrees it won't take long for demographics to reach the point of one screen for every 10,000 people—a benchmark that would make Australian exhibition the per capita equal of the United States.

Concurrently, Australian boxoffice numbers have risen almost 100 percent since 1990, from AUS$284.5 million (US$224.7 million) to AUS$536.8 million (US$424.0 million) in 1996. Exhibitors are optimistic about the future, but it remains to be seen if '97 will be the eleventh consecutive year of rising boxoffice revenues for Australia and if the rising attendance levels (which last year reached 74 million admissions) can fill the increasing number of screens.

The three major exhibitors—The Greater Union Organisation, Hoyts Cinemas Ltd. and Village Roadshow Ltd.—currently make up an estimated 60-65 percent of the market. The fourth largest exhibitor, Queensland's Birch Carroll & Coyle, is owned by Greater Union, which also carries a 20 percent interest in Village Roadshow. Richard Parton, general manager of Greater Union's film division, says the advent of the multiplex—and now the megaplex—has definitely changed the face of exhibition, but he notes that exhibition has always been evolving. "It started in the early '60s with the drive-in," says Parton. "Then we went more or less to twins, triples and hardtops. The drive-ins went out of fashion and then we moved into multiplexes. Now we're looking at the megaplexes."

Greater Union, founded in 1912, plans to open Australia's first 30-screen complex in Marion by the end of the year. The megaplex will feature the latest in technology and theatre design—another trend that has greatly affected Australian theatres in the last decade—including stadium seating, digital sound and computerized ticketing systems. "From the presentation point of view, it's pretty hard to imagine where we go after this. All I see we can improve from here is what we can offer the patrons as they arrive—by creating more of a sense of excitement, offering better concessions, more gaming areas or coffee shops."

Ian Sands, managing director of Roadshow Film Distributors, a subsidiary of Village Roadshow Ltd., notes that the need to fill screens has brought along significant changes in distribution practices. Costs have spiraled; there is a glut of product, which means the medium-sized film tends to get squeezed out and the independent, specialty titles find themselves swimming alongside the mainstream films. According to Sands, "There is a blurring of the lines between what is straight commercial and what is specialized now." "I don't suppose we call them 'art-house' [films] anymore," agrees Parton. "That seems to be a word that's gone out of the dictionary. But the specialized type of film does get out here and can do reasonably good business."

GOOD AS GOLD

Australian Movie Convention offers the opportunity to explore the Gold Coast

When the more than 800-1,000 delegates descend on the Gold Coast's Royal Pines Resort this August 13 to 16 for the 1997 Australian Movie Convention, entertainment will be the focus of the week and it won't just be limited to the convention. Set on 200 hectares of manicured gardens at Ashmore, 5 km from Surfers Paradise, the Royal Pines Resort, which will host the convention for the second time, offers its guests a plethora of conference facilities and recreational activities. The surrounding Gold Coast offers a wonderland of entertainment opportunities for those who plan to extend their stay or find a free moment during the convention.

HOTEL AUSTRALIA: Guests relax at the Royal Pines Resort Hotel. (GOLD COAST TOURISM BUREAU)

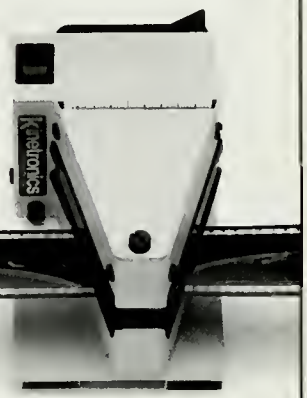
In addition to their conference activities, delegates should take the opportunity to enjoy the recreational facilities at the Resort, including two 18-hole championship golf courses; a 25-meter indoor lap pool; lessons from tennis, swimming and golf professionals; a beauty salon and, should the need arise, a wedding chapel. Food lovers can enjoy a choice of six fine restaurants.



The Royal Pines Resort is also home to one of Australia's only resort wildlife sanctuaries, which accommodates koalas and wallabies and is run by local Currumbin Sanctuary. With more than 11,000 trees and 17 freshwater lakes, the resort boasts some of the most beautiful grounds in Australia. It has a strong commitment to the environment and has endeavored to ensure that some of the original features of what used to be a former dairy farm have been maintained.

Delegates are provided with a regular daily shuttle service to strategic points around the Gold Coast, a 35 km stretch of beach extending from Coolangatta to Southport with the high-rise splendor of Surfers Paradise at its center. Almost four million people annually head to the shores of the Gold Coast to enjoy everything from sunbathing to gambling. The Gold Coast is home to Australia's most exciting theme parks—Movie World, Sea World, Dreamworld, Wet 'n' Wild Waterpark and Cable Sportsworld—as well as the Fleays Fauna Center and Currumbin Sanctuary, which both have excellent collections of Australia's plant and wildlife. Water sports, including deep-sea fishing, are also a highlight of recreational activities available off the Gold Coast. South Stradbroke Island, in the deeper waters of the Pacific Ocean, is an angler's paradise.

Only a 30-minute drive from the heart of Surfers Paradise lies the magnificent Gold Coast Hinterland. Visitors to the area can enjoy rainforests with waterfalls, picturesque nature walks, guest accommodation, arts and crafts, restaurants and a bird's-eye view of the Surfers Paradise skyline. The diverse attractions, from the beautiful beaches to the Casino and local shopping centers, make the Gold Coast one of Australia's favorite holiday playgrounds. According to Richard Parton, president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors Association of Queensland, "There's plenty to do if you like surfing or if you like bushwalking or if you like going to the theme parks and shopping. So you've got a bit of everything there. If you can find time outside of the convention, well you certainly won't be bored."

Response No. 40

Lyn McCarthy, owner of Dendy Films, a nine-screen, five-site independent exhibitor and distributor, thinks the glut of screens and product is potentially very dangerous for the industry—particularly the trend to exploit specialty product to fill screens. "We're finding that small films are going out far too wide and what's happening is that the individual cinemas are making so much smaller a slice of the cake." McCarthy adds another consequence is that potential patrons are overwhelmed and turned off. "We're so busy churning out these films week after week, nothing stands out as being special. When you can get something to stand out, then you make some real money, but that doesn't happen as often as it used to." And what is true for the independent arthouse can also be applied to the local multiplex. According to McCarthy, if it's not "Lost World" or "Liar, Liar," a film can get lost in the shuffle.

As the market for new theatres approaches saturation, exhibitors are quickly re-thinking their strategies. Some talk about slowing down by the year 2000. But what happens then? Insiders say consolidation is the key. Peter Ivany, chief executive officer of Hoyts Cinemas, says that just like the patterns set by American companies, Australia will see the refurbishment of existing sites to bring them up to date. "Development never stops, but it changes," explains Ivany. Many agree that it's the ideal time to look at the older sites—the early multiplexes of six to eight screens—to see if they can be improved or developed.

Some believe there is too much worry about what isn't really a problem. John Rochester, chief executive officer of Reading Australia Pty Ltd., a new but growing player in the market, is not a great believer in saturation. "I can see why the industry says that will happen, but what actually happens is that a lot of older and more tired sites that really ought to have been rejuvenated and renovated years ago will be the casualty here."

"You pick up an idea from one market and try to get that across your circuit globally."
-Peter Ivany

It's clear that a pruning stage will come. Older theatres might have a second chance as a subrun or dollar house so "the industry will continue to thrive," Rochester maintains, though he agrees that the momentum will gradually stabilize. "People will start looking at deals a bit closer. Not every deal that comes along is a good deal. You don't have to take it just because somebody else might take it."

Of course, one of the answers to market saturation is international expansion. Hoyts, the country's oldest circuit, was the first to venture overseas by moving into the United States and New Zealand. The 186 theatres Hoyts now operates in Australia make up less than seven percent of its overall holdings. Currently, Hoyts operates 1,160 screens in the United States, Australia and New Zealand, with plans to move into Europe and Mexico. The circuit boasts a stated goal of 2,000 screens worldwide by 2000. Ivany says, "I think we'll be beyond that because we're running ahead of ourselves now. Now our five-year plan is 2002, and by that stage we'll be closer to 2,700 or 2,800 screens, the way we're going."

Being a player on an international market can give a company many advantages, according to Ivany. "I think from the American market we've learned what it's like to be in a market that's the most competitive in the world—how you can make different sizes of screens work in different areas and how you've got to be very specific in your building and your planning."

What is learned in one country can be applied to the other sites very quickly. Hoyts recently launched coffee in its United States theatres, which it's now implementing worldwide. Ivany continues, "We've learned to change the operating structures of our theatres so we can survive at different levels of income, in terms of manpower flexibility and automation. You pick up an idea from one [market] and try to get that across your circuit globally as soon as you can. You learn a lot about competitive strategy because it varies from market to market. You learn not to get bluffed."

Village Roadshow is a prime example of a company that has not only expanded, but diversified its holdings to grow stronger. Founded in 1954 with a single drive-in, Village Roadshow now has 763 screens worldwide and separate divisions in film distribution, home entertainment, theme parks and film production. Exhibition still remains its core activity and accounted for more than a fourth of its cash flow last year. The company has aggressive plans for 3,000 screens in more than 20 countries by 2001, which includes expanding its Australian circuit to 660 screens. Greater Union is also now looking for offshore markets to develop on its own. The company has plans to build theatres in the Middle East, the first of which is a 10-plex in Dubai due to open in September, 1998.

Reading's Rochester sees Australia as one of the most aggressive markets in the world. "I think everyone has honed their skills in that regard due to the competitive nature of the industry." Reading, which has cinemas in the United States and Puerto Rico, stands directly in the face of that competition since the company announced its plans to have 100-150 screens and up to 10 percent of the market share by 2000. Its first plans were for a 25-screen, stand-alone complex in Burwood, Victoria, halted when the minister of planning ruled that cinemas could not be built outside of shopping or district centers. The decision put a crimp in Reading's plans for stand alone cinemas, but it still opened its first build, a six-plex at Townsville in northern Queensland, last December, and next up is another six-plex in Mandurah, Western Australia. Rochester, who previously worked for both Hoyts and Village Roadshow, says Reading is in for the long haul.

Rochester has great hope that, eventually, green-fielding [stand-alone theatres] will gain a foothold in Australia and alleviate some competition by moving the attention away from crowded city centers. "You've seen the trend emerging in the States. It's only going to be a matter of time before the whole industry wants to do it in Australia." Rochester is quick to add, "I know that we're not particularly welcomed by the existing players, but not to worry,—I think as the market matures that will change. We'd just like to take a meaningful place in what I regard as a very exciting industry and a terrific marketplace."

"It's definitely more competitive now. The stakes are much higher." -Lyn McCarthy

As the industry expands, the small, independent theatre owners find themselves being squeezed out of the market, particularly since multiplexes will now screen product that was traditionally seen as independent art-house fare. "'More challenging' is the nice way to put it," says McCarthy. "It's definitely more competitive now. The stakes are much higher."

This year's Movie Convention will highlight Australian film with a half-day seminar and special screenings. Homegrown product is very important to exhibitors and distributors.

Of the 278 films released last year in Australia, 24 were local productions which accounted for eight percent of the boxoffice totals. According to Parton, 1996 was an exceptional year for local films, and all because of a cute little pig. Exhibitors can normally expect about 10 to 12 percent of United States boxoffice results, but an Australian hit film, like last year's "Babe," can make all the difference. "While United States product really drives the business, when you do get a top Australian film like that, then you really are riding high," says Parton. Ivany says international acclaim for films like "Babe" and "Shine" not only boosts local boxoffice numbers, but also increases national pride —"It's important for the country."

Australia will be one of the first countries in the world to ring in the new millennium, literally and figuratively. Its strategic position, unique qualities and synergistic relationship with the United States' market makes it an important player in the film world. With the coming 21st century, the Australian film industry prepares to "Shine" on bright and bold toward a new age in theatrical exhibition.

HOYTS SO GOOD

Roger Eaton Explains Hoyts' Campaign to Expand the Northeast Market by Jon Alon Walz

One of the most aggressive campaigns in recent memory will hit the U.S. east coast later in the year, and it will not, surprisingly, involve dirty politicians, tobacco companies, or a referendum on Manhattan rent control.

Rather, international exhibition powerhouse Hoyts Cinemas has stepped up its United States expansion on the eastern seaboard—from Maryland to Maine—with plans for almost 200 new screens within a year, for a total of 1,000 screens by the summer of 1998.

"We targeted the northeastern corner of the U.S. as a piece of territory that we believed was significantly underdeveloped, and we've now started to aggressively turn up the campaign," says Hoyts Cinemas President & Chief Operating Officer Roger Eaton. "The northeast is the most underperforming region in the United States currently, and that's where our focus has been."

Growth in movie attendance in the northeast has lagged behind the rest of the U.S. for most of 1996 as well as the first quarter of 1997. "The key reason is the facilities," Eaton surmises. "If you go into California or into Dallas you can see what's driving the increase in visitation rates. There are many pockets of the northeast that have traditionally done less the four admissions per annum, which is miles off the United States average."

Avoiding the major metropolitan areas almost completely in favor of developing moderately-sized multiplexes in suburban communities, has allowed Hoyts a certain level of comfort during this time of growth. While several large-scale exhibitors continue to define the urban landscape with 24 to 30 screen theatres in the big cities, Eaton feels Hoyts can get away with being more intimate.

"Because ours is a regional focus instead of a city focus, we typically build complexes with 12 to 16 screens," he notes. "We can get down to working with populations as low as 40,000 and 50,000 people, and obviously you're going to detail your investment to that group."

Recent openings of a new 10-plex in Fishkill, N.Y., a renovated and expanded (from 6 to 12 screens) complex in the nearby Hudson Valley Mall, and 15-screen flagship in the Solomon Pond Mall in Berlin, Mass. (a suburb of Boston) all typify Hoyts' current expansion philosophy.

The Solomon Pond Mall theatre is the first theatre in New England to offer stadium style seating and digital sound in all auditoriums, as well ATM-style ticket-purchasing machines.

"Solomon Pond opened about a month ago, and it's performing extremely well," Eaton explains. "We took a combination of the learning we've had from the rest of the United States and the world, and then zeroed in on our customers' requirements. We made the front page of the Boston Globe, which is not an easy thing to do, and we had four or five TV stations come out. We got massive coverage on that opening."

Hoyts has been a player in worldwide exhibition since its modest beginnings in Melbourne, Australia in the early 1900s. Founded by dentist Dr. Arthur Russell, the chain had expanded into the far reaches of Australia by 1926. In 1935, Russell sold the company to 20th Century Fox.

Investor Leon Fink bought the circuit from Fox in 1982, and added current CEO Peter Ivany, and other key executives including Roger Eaton. In 1986 the new, well-funded management decided that it was time to gain a stronghold in America.

"We started in '86 with two acquisitions, and a further one in 1988," Eaton says. The initial purchases were the Boston-based 96-screen Cinema Centres and the 72-screen Sonderling Broadcast Corp.

The company, however, has no current plans to expand outside of its northeastern base says Eaton. "When Peter Ivany initiated the expansion, he always had the view that if we kept in a concentrated area and got to know it very well, we'd be very successful. Basically the game plan has been to maintain the theatres we have, work with a very strong regional strategy and stay out of the key cities. It's worked very well for us.

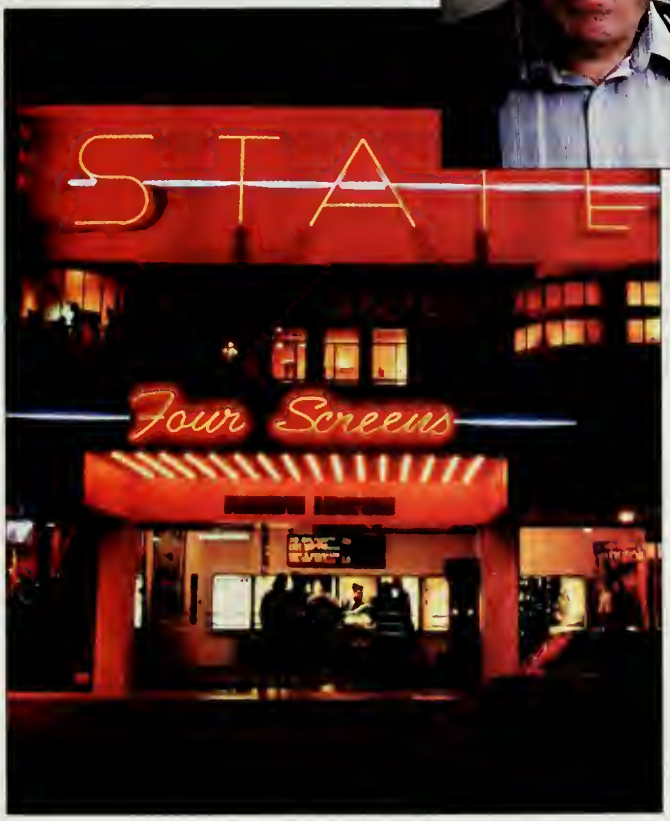
"At the end of the day, the incomes people pick up in the northeast are pretty good," Eaton adds. "Real estate is obviously expensive and most development is a trickier proposition than it is in the rest of the U. S., but as we started to open the new theatres we've seen a very good response—that's why we've kept the rapid expansion going. We are very excited about our investment in the U.S. and feel that we'll continue to grow extremely fast."

A WHOLE "NEW" WORLD

New Zealand's Exhibitors Once Again Are Warriors

by Pat Kramer

As one of the latest countries to embrace multiplex development, New Zealand's exhibition industry has completely rebuilt itself over the past seven years, nearly doubling in size from 120 screens in 1990 to the current 234, and from six or seven million admissions to 14 million. And while not too long ago two major cinema chains dominated the industry, now the independents are claiming nearly 25 percent of the market share, up from under nine percent in 1990.



Part of the credit for this drastic turnaround goes to the New Zealand Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association (NZMPEA), whose president, Mark Christensen, is part-owner of the State Cinema Complex in Nelson, one of the more progressive multiplexes in the country.

Originally set up as a lobbying group for cinema exhibitors in the early '30s, the NZMPEA for many years served more to provide a point of contact for cinema operators than as a political organization. The main issue used to be the National Industry Awards System, which determined the rate of pay and working conditions for the entire industry. When the National Industry Awards System was thrown out in favor of the Employment Contracts Act in the early '90s, many independent exhibitors were relieved. "This move had a massive effect on improving the flexibility of working arrangements for independent theatre owners," says Christensen.

Free enterprise, however, was still years away due to a duopoly arrangement between the country's two major chains: Pacer Kerridge (formerly Kerridge Odeon) and Hoyts (formerly Amalgamated Theatres), which held onto 90 percent of the market share, making it very difficult for new exhibitors. Says Christensen, "The lack of real competition meant that there was no significant reinvestment by either chain in facilities or equipment."

In 1990, when Pacer Kerridge attempted to merge with Hoyts, a move which would have created a huge monopoly, the NZMPEA fiercely opposed it, along with the New Zealand Motion Picture Distributors' Association. The merger did not go through. In the wake of that decision, Multiplex Theatres Ltd., a group of independent investors, opened the country's first multiplex (a six-plex) in Palmerston North. Soon after, Christensen formed Multishowcase Cinemas of New Zealand Ltd., comprised of local investors interested in building a state-of-the-art multiplex. In 1992, the group acquired Nelson's historic State Cinema, an old art deco theatre built in 1936. They rebuilt it into a cutting-edge four-screen complex and renamed it the State Cinema Centre. While they were advised to build three theatres at the State, Multishowcase built four, adding "The Metro," a plush, 76-seat "boutique" theatre for showing art-house films. To service patrons—as well as the public—they built a fully-licensed gourmet restaurant, Cafe Metro. Other innovations included an automated boxoffice and concession system and advanced reservation seating by telephone. Christensen notes that the advance ticketing system has significantly contributed to rising admissions. "We set out really to do more than people were advising us to do," states Christensen.

Since opening in '92, they've added two DTS digital processors and two Dolby Digital processors, making the State the first complex in the country to become all-digital. And next year, two more screens will be added, bringing the State up to six.

In its five years of operation, the State Cinema Centre's admissions have far exceeded initial projections and have continued to build steadily, sometimes against national trends. According to Christensen, the State's occupancy rate is very high by local standards.

Now in his second term as president, Christensen says NZMPEA still faces several challenges, including finding ways for independents to jointly market their theatres to keep the independents' position strong. With New Zealand admissions nearly double what they were just seven years ago, Christensen proudly states, "It's a completely different industry from what it was. The independents' market share has increased substantially. We're now dealing with a lot of new companies, new people with new ideas, and the exhibitors' association has gone from a negative to a positive in peoples' minds.

"Most of the people in the industry now are energetic, forward-thinking, and forward moving, [which] is quite a change from when I first came into the organization in 1983," he continues. "As a result, even the provincial locations in New Zealand, far from the metropolitan centers, can now provide quality viewing experiences for their audiences."

TO THE MAX

Inside Miramax, the Most Successful Specialty Marketing Force in Movie History by Wade Major

ART AND COMMERCE: A love of foreign films that started with Truffaut's "The 400 Blows" is embodied by Miramax's 1994 release "Red" (left). Bob Weinstein's brainchild Miramax/Dimension goes in for earthier, more exploitation-oriented fare, exemplified by Salma Hayek in "From Dusk Till Dawn."

It's easy to imagine Max and Miriam Weinstein seated in the lap of 1950s post-war prosperity, staring into the beaming faces of their strapping baby boys and wondering just what sensational successes the American dream might offer them. As a diamond-cutter, Max had done well for the family. Surely little Robert and Harvey had as much to look forward to.

Little did they know.

Today, as co-chairmen of the company they named for their parents, Miramax Films, it's probably fair to say that Bob and Harvey Weinstein have done their parents proud. With a style alternately characterized as visionary and ruthless, rash and meticulous, the siblings from Queens have made an indelible mark on Hollywood, obliterating conventional wisdom while transforming art-house oddities like "My Left Foot," "The Thin Blue Line," "The Crying Game," "sex, lies and videotape," "Sling Blade" and "Clerks" into profitable movie classics.

Now in their early forties, the self-described "blue-collar guys with white-collar taste" have said they began their peculiar path to successfully merging art and commerce when, as teenagers, they hurried to see Francois Truffaut's "The 400 Blows" at the local art-house, mistakenly believing they were in for a sex romp. While the movie failed to deliver the hoped-for titillation, it nonetheless had a profound effect on the young Weinsteins, instilling in them a love for the medium and, more importantly, an awareness that cinematic magic did exist outside the bounds of Hollywood.

Some years later, after a brief flirtation with college, the boys made their first foray into the business world, renovating a dilapidated 3,000-seat theatre in Buffalo to serve as a base for concert promotion. Here the fledgling entrepreneurs honed their now-legendary marketing skills, hosting such then-hot acts as Billy Joel, Lynyrd Skynyrd, Genesis and The Grateful Dead.

> "We were always like Israeli generals, because we were first into battle."
> -Harvey Weinstein

In 1979, they shifted gears and formed Miramax Films, stepping into an overcrowded, underfinanced independent distribution marketplace where they would labor in obscurity for three years before finally securing the picture that would put Miramax on the map: an Amnesty International concert film featuring rock performances and comedy bits by Monty Python troupe members called "The Secret Policeman's Other Ball." As its first major acquisition rolled on to a then-staggering $6 million gross, Miramax suddenly found itself a player.

The fifteen years since that time have been the stuff of legend, highlighted by the 1993 sale of Miramax to Disney for a reported $60 to $80 million, and culminating with the indie powerhouse's recent near-sweep of the major 1996 Oscars, led by Best Picture winner "The English Patient." Having survived the tumultuous "mini-major mania" of the 1980s that saw promising companies like Cannon and Orion eventually reduced to bankruptcy, Miramax today leads the charge of a new breed proud to be called "independent." No longer driven to compete with the majors, many of today's independents are content with their status as prestige divisions. It is a measure of Miramax's influence that Universal Pictures' recent acquisition of October Films leaves only Paramount Pictures without such a specialty production and/or distribution arm.

As it has earned admirers, so also has Miramax's success inspired detractors, some of whom insist the company bends the rules of good business ethics. Defenders maintain that the Weinsteins are singled out for criticism out of jealousy, or because of their rough-and-tumble personae, pointing out that the practices for which they are most often attacked—everything from doctoring distribution charges and inflating boxoffice figures to deceptive marketing—are either unproven or have been standard operating procedure within the industry for decades.

Both friends and professional foes are drawn to the seeming contradictions behind a team that has redefined the creative and fiscal possibilities of specialized films. One longtime company observer defines them as simultaneously "the best and the worst thing that has ever happened to independent film."

With that status comes perceived power. Even Miramax's most fervent detractors are wary of offending the Brothers Weinstein; while many were willing to speak to BOXOFFICE on background for this piece, none would comment on the record. Surprisingly, those who view them warily are almost uniformly grudging admirers as well, confessing that the Weinsteins fill a vital niche in the marketplace. They play the hardball game of movie marketing the hardball way, and they do so with undeniably solid instincts: The company's '90s renaissance began when the Weinsteins used exhibitor eagerness over "The Grifters" as a wedge to line up mainstream bookings for the now-classic Italian film "Cinema Paradiso," which went on to become the most popular foreign-language release in the history of U.S. exhibition.

Acquiring and exhibiting quality films, as many distributors will confess, still paints only a partial picture. Finding an audience for a film, particularly specialty and foreign films, requires shrewd, even brutal, marketing. And the artists most able to thrive in their relationships with Miramax not only appreciate the Weinsteins' tough-minded business sense, many of them love them for it.

"We just like to make the movie," says "Clerks" writer/director Kevin Smith, whose recently released "Chasing Amy" is a textbook Miramax success story. "After that, it's their

"WE HAVEN'T SENSATIONALIZED IT, WE'VE REVOLUTIONIZED IT..."

As this issue was going to print, BOXOFFICE was fortunate enough to catch up with Miramax co-chairman Harvey Weinstein, who rang us up via a London car phone for comments and reflections on his company's past, present and future.

BOXOFFICE: For years, as Miramax grew, there was a negative media image of the company in general, and of you and Bob in particular. Why?

HARVEY WEINSTEIN: We at Miramax are so busy producing our movies, caring about our films, marketing our movies—what we don't do is get on the phone and spin bad stuff about our competitors. Finally, this year, for Rolling Stone, Bob and I took the gloves off. We couldn't just sit and be a punching bag any more. Since that time, we've heard some of the criticism subsiding, like this stuff about how we "gobble up the marketplace." I went to Cannes and saw a movie called "Dobermann" in the market. I sat and waited. I saw other executives from other companies walk out. I thought someone would step up and show their mettle or make a commitment on what was probably the best acquisition at the Festival. Nobody stepped up. Same thing with "Shall We Dance." We were in negotiations, we hadn't closed our deal. I watched Fine Line, October, all of them go into the movie and walk out. They passed. We spent a startling $300,000 on that acquisition.

BOXOFFICE: And yet, it's also important to you to have a passion for the film.

WEINSTEIN: I have a movie out right now which we produced with Film Four called "Brassed Off." I love this movie. It has not received the best reviews, but I am going to fight for this movie like I fought for "Sling Blade," and so is this company, because we believe in it. I don't care if the snotty critics in New York like it or don't like it. If nobody else is going to fight for movies like this, then we're going to fight for them.

BOXOFFICE: You and Bob have been compared with old-style studio bosses. How does that make you feel?

WEINSTEIN: When it's Irving Thalberg or David Selznick, I take that as a compliment. And, more often than not, those are the names we hear. I think both of those guys were intimately involved with their movies. They were hands-on. They made things happen. It's about having fun with the marketing and the advertising and talking to the audience. We won't say die on a movie that [deserves our best effort].

BOXOFFICE: Some people would say that rather than have fun with the marketing, you're actually sensationalizing it.

WEINSTEIN: We haven't sensationalized it, we've revolutionized it. We've taken these movies out of the ghetto, which was mission number one, through a combination of savvy marketing and, more importantly, producing. People work so hard to make a movie—the sweat that directors and writers and other people go through. And then for a distribution company to be blase'? I wouldn't want my movie to be handled by some blase' company when I killed myself to make it.

BOXOFFICE: Throughout the '80s, you resisted the trend to expand and compete with the studios, and now you've been vindicated for it. Was that far-sightedness on your part or, as you have often said, just "sticking to your knitting"?

WEINSTEIN: I think sticking to the knitting is what we've always been good at. I'm so thrilled that after all the success of "The English Patient," the very next hit we had was "Chasing Amy," made for $250,000. To me, that's Miramax. The biggest gamble of our lives turns out to be correct, and then the smallest risk we've ever taken turns out to be a hit. I've said this a thousand times: it's all about taste. When people have passion and taste, it's in the script, it's the writing. Last year, all the independents together released a hundred movies and we released about thirty. We out-grossed them all. There's plenty of room for other people and other companies, but they've got to stop throwing slings and arrows at Miramax and look to themselves and ask why they aren't doing a better job.

BOXOFFICE: You're a subsidiary of a company whose very name conjures up the taste of its founder. If you could look 100 years into the future, what kind of company would you like for Miramax to have become?

WEINSTEIN: I'd like to see Miramax grow in the Walt Disney tradition and become a brand name for quality films. And whether a film got a good review or a bad review, [I'd be happy] if people just said, "It's adventurous filmmaking and there's taste and intelligence behind it. Even if it's not a hundred percent what we want it to be, the experience of it is something that we'll talk about, and we'll celebrate cinema."

call. I don't know a thing about marketing, so I would never argue with them about a marketing campaign. When they first came up with the poster for 'Chasing Amy,' my take was that it looked like a Details cover. But Harvey said, 'Trust me, trust me. It's very eye-catching. It'll work.' And he was right."

Smith's faith in Miramax marketing is buoyed not only by his positive "Clerks" and "Chasing Amy" experiences, but by a less-than-encouraging detour with Polygram subsidiary Gramercy for his second film, "Mallrats"—a critical and commercial failure. "The people at Gramercy were really nice, but they don't know how to market a film like Miramax does. Miramax can take a movie that will probably never see an audience, and they'll find it an audience."

Smith claims that, without the Weinsteins, Miramax's remaining assets would amount to little, a judgment clearly shared by the Disney brass who eagerly re-upped the Weinsteins for another seven years only three years into the Disney/Miramax deal. As Disney's resources allow Miramax to grow, questions have risen among some observers as to how the Weinsteins will manage the company's transformation from its boutique roots.

A recent exodus of senior executives suggested to some that the Weinsteins have a hard time sharing power. Harvey Weinstein disputes this. "I think we have some new stars at the company," he told BOXOFFICE, "and it's time for Bob and me to play more of a chaperone role, like the guiding light. We were always like Israeli generals, because we were first into battle. Now we are starting to see real stars, not only in marketing and publicity, but with some of the younger production kids. It's amazing to watch your assistants become vice presidents, to see the guys who used to spill my coffee on me now making production decisions involving millions of dollars."

"I think they're used to doing everything,"

"Miramax takes a movie that will never see an audience and finds it an audience."
-Kevin Smith

says "Pulp Fiction" producer Lawrence Bender, who is making five films with Miramax this year alone. "And as the company gets bigger, they're realizing that they can't do everything, even working around the clock. There still aren't enough hours in the day. At the studios it's the opposite. There's so much delegation that no one really takes responsibility for anything."

Others say the Weinsteins' willingness to publicly accept blame as well as take credit is proof of their integrity. "The biggest disappointment of everything that I've done has been a movie that I love, called 'Into the West,'" Harvey Weinstein told GQ magazine in 1995. "I marketed it like a Disney movie because we had just signed the Disney deal, and I did all sorts of Disney testing. And at the end of the day, I completely blew the marketing. It haunts me. I want another chance."

Competitors, however, say that the Weinsteins are "ghettoizing" independent film with tabloid-style marketing better suited to the studio world. While Fine Line, Fox Searchlight, October, Gramercy and Sony Pictures Classics have all made strides in recent years, Miramax-scale success continues to elude them. "If the other majors all want to have specialty labels," says Marcy Granata, executive vice president of marketing and publicity at Miramax, "they're going to have to have a lot of patience with them. It doesn't come overnight. You have to want to nurture a movie. What this company has is that way to nurture a film."

As Smith sees it, Miramax's exceptional performance is just further proof that the other companies don't know what they're doing. "In order to pick great films," he says, "you have to be a great member of the audience. That's what these guys are, first and foremost. They like to watch movies. You talk to a lot of other studio heads and production execs and you find that these cats don't go to a theatre. They'll do test screenings, but if you ask them in their spare time, 'Did you see a movie over the weekend?' they'll usually say, 'No.' Bob and Harvey not only check out all of their own flicks, but they check out the competition as well, with a real audience."

Success hasn't come equally in all areas, however. Miramax's first forays into production were discouraging. The 1990 film "The Lemon Sisters," starring Diane Keaton, bombed, as did the Molly Ringwald starrer "Strike It Rich," released the same year through the company's now-defunct Millimeter division. But Bender—who with Quentin Tarantino delivered Miramax's most successful in-house production to date with "Pulp Fiction"—contends that those early, leaner production days are coming to a close.

"I definitely think there has been a learning curve at the company. I don't think that they were as strong with in-house production in terms of what they developed initially, but it has definitely changed. They learned that they needed to bring in development people. I think people are going to start changing their tune when the current crop of movies starts coming out."

Smith also discounts rumors of Harvey's alleged predilection for seizing control of the editing process, an alleged trait which has earned him the dubious nickname among Miramax detractors of "Harvey Scissorhands." "We were really nervous about 'Chasing Amy,'" he says, "because the first cut was about two hours and five minutes. We thought the dude would really blow a gasket and go, 'You're out of your minds! Cut it by a half hour!' The first time we showed it to him, he hugged us and kissed us and said, 'Come here. You guys made a beautiful f--king movie.' And Scott and I were thinking that's how they should market the flick: 'Chasing Amy,' the movie that made Harvey Weinstein kiss two guys!"

Having changed the entire nature of American independent film, Miramax continues to expand its reach. "I think we're re-inventing ourselves every day," says Meryl Poster, Miramax's executive vice president of production. "The scripts we're getting right now are all epic romances, like 'The English Patient.' Well, we did 'The English Patient,' and I don't think we're going to do it again. So when some of the other companies try to emulate our formula, we'll be on to something different."

"When others try to emulate our formula, we'll be on to something different." -Meryl Poster

A four-year-old book division is flourishing, aided by best-sellers like the screenplay for "Pulp Fiction" and a novelization of "The Piano." A three-year-old soundtrack division has had similar success with soundtracks for "Smoke" and the Oscar-winning score to "Il Postino." And, last but far from least, Miramax's upstart genre label, Dimension, which was created and is run primarily by Bob Weinstein, has finally hit its stride with the Wes Craven horror/comedy "Scream"—Dimension's first-ever $100 million grosser.

In the end, what seems to irk certain power brokers about the Weinsteins may have less to do with their power than their freedom. Even as they enjoy the privileges of major players and A-list insiders, the Weinsteins cultivate and maintain their hard-won status as the consummate outsiders. Few would say they've mellowed, but success has undoubtedly changed them in some ways. Harvey Weinstein in particular seems more and more willing to look upon the companies Miramax competes against as reflections of its influence, and therefore, in an odd way, as a part of the Miramax legacy. "It's not that there are fewer good studio films or that the studios have given up on serious fare," Harvey wrote in a March 24 Los Angeles Times editorial that appeared just hours before this year's Oscar ceremony. "It's that the independents (most of which have studio backing) are now competing on a more level playing field, both at the boxoffice and in the Oscar race... Everyone who works in the movie business, be it at a studio or an independent, or an independent affiliated with a studio, is part of the same film community. What unites us is our love and passion for all different kinds of movies."

STRAIGHT SHOOTING

New York's THE SHOOTING GALLERY Cooks Up a Recipe For Indie Success by Alex Albanese

With "Sling Blade's" $10 million sale to Miramax and its subsequent Academy Award for Best Adapted Screenplay, the spotlight suddenly found New York City's The Shooting Gallery, the indie production company that gave Billy Bob Thornton the green light for his low budget debut. Already known in some circles for its formula of buying filmmakers large amounts of creative freedom with tight cost control on ultra-low budgets, TSG now has the industry attention and momentum needed to become a player. But its field of choice will remain character- and story-driven independent film, where unknowns have a chance and productions are fueled more by passion than dollars.

A HANDS-OFF PRODUCER: Meistrich (left) makes an uncharacteristic set visit to TSG's "Drunks."

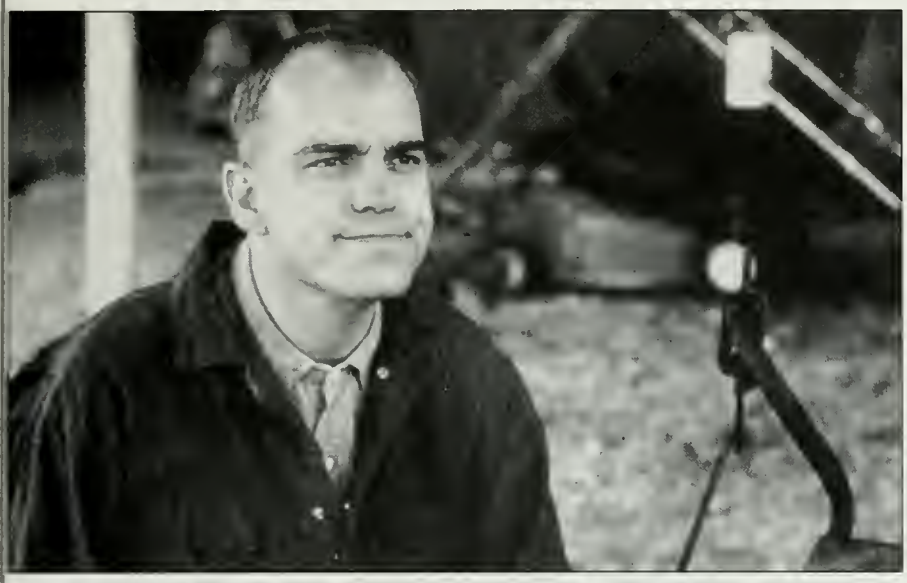
Their offices perfectly embody the company's ideals of no nonsense success—on the edge of uber-trendy SoHo, TSG occupies an airy top floor space with a wrap-around deck, but there are none of the precious design frills that are epidemic in that neighborhood; just a comfortable, straightforward workspace, where even executive vice presidents share offices and answer their own phones. "Would I like to have somebody answering my phones?" Nancy Kriegel, the new head of production, asks rhetorically. "Sure. Can I live without it? Absolutely."

Kriegel, who joined The Shooting Gallery in March, is part of the current post-"Sling Blade" growth spurt that, with the recent addition of a foreign distribution arm, post production facilities and services, and a plan on the boards for a studio and back-lot complex along Manhattan's Hudson River, is turning the indie production company into a full service East Coast studio. "It's amazing," says Kriegel, "it's like being in Hollywood in 1925."



With two films currently in production, three in the cutting room and two more finishing prep, Kriegel may soon need an assistant, but the basic "lean and mean" philosophy of the company is one thing that won't be changing any time soon. "Most of our budgets range from $1.5 million or less to about $2.5 million," Kriegel states. "That is our mandate: to make low-budget, quality movies without the fat. We have an opportunity to create a company that makes movies as well as the studios do, and in as practical and professional a manner, but without all the bureaucracy—and all the money."

Though they started making low budget movies out of necessity, executive producer Larry Meistrich, the 30-year-old head of the company, doesn't ever want to make movies with Hollywood budgets. "My personality," he says "couldn't handle negotiating with the agent of an actor who we're paying $20 million, but who only wants to work four days every other week. I don't have the temperament to have a pleasant conversation about that, and philosophically I just think it's wrong to spend $220 million on a movie." He professes to be put off by perk package wars and the other "unreasonable, inappropriate behavior" that seems to accompany big money and the studio mindset. "I'd much rather just perform." He candidly admits things are "much bigger than I thought they would be when we started, and it's happened a lot faster. I'm a CEO. Five years ago I didn't know what that meant! But I think we've stepped up, and I'm surrounding myself with good people."

His unexpected success is in an industry Meistrich came upon pretty much by chance. "I wasn't some burning film guy since I was eight years old. I was actually more into sports." But he must have been as tenacious and resourceful an athlete as he is a producer—

despite his average size, he played football for Johns Hopkins University, where he was "the smallest guy in the conference."

While at Hopkins, a teammate's girlfriend got a bit part in a movie shooting in Baltimore. "She mentioned they were looking for criminals for this jail scene, and we should go and check it out," Meistrich says. It turned out the convicts needed to dance, and an injury prevented Meistrich from finishing the audition. But because "I had no idea how any of this worked," he managed to bluff his way through a singing audition and ended up heading to a final casting session with one other hopeful. The other gentleman, who had studied drama at Yale, became irritated when he discovered Meistrich "just came here on a goof. He was all offended. I thought, 'They're going to be mean to me and I'm going to be messed with.' I walk in with this huge chip on my shoulder, and they just look at us and tell the other guy 'All right, you can leave.'"

THROUGH THE ROOF: "Sling Blade" catapulted both writer-director Billy Bob Thornton and producing-financing company The Shooting Gallery into the indie film vanguard.

The film was John Waters' "Cry Baby," and Meistrich's role as a featured extra gave him a week's exposure to the workings of a movie set. Intrigued, he hooked up after graduation with a friend's brother who was working as an assistant location manager. "I started working for free, and had the dumb luck to literally work every day for the next two and a half years. I was able to pack a huge amount of experience into a short period of time."

During that period Meistrich worked every crew position "except hair and make up." What he did most was assistant direct, production manage, and meet other young filmmakers on the way up—on "Law and Order" he worked as the second AD under Good Machine's Ted Hope. "I was trained very well by Ted," he states. Getting an idea of how production companies ran, Meistrich decided he could run one too. He and Bob Gosse started The Shooting Gallery for about $7,000 as a "film commune" for struggling young independent filmmakers like themselves, sharing office space, materials and equipment. "We took turns locking up at night, and made money by helping people crew up, or drove around stealing parking cones so we could rent them for 50 cents a day.

"In New York," Meistrich explains "most crew people have other aspirations. If you're on a movie, you can crew up your own projects with the seconds and thirds you're working with, that's how we started. We met John Patrick Shanley in a bar and he gave us the rights to a short story he'd written."

That story, "The Lonely Impulse of Delight," was made into a short film starring Lili Taylor and Eric Stoltz in 1989. "We started very slowly in a lot of ways, and were able to go from there to there to there pretty quickly, but without skipping any steps."

The partners solidified their knowledge of "nuts and bolts" low budget production on six more self-financed shorts over the next three years. They also line produced two others on a work-for-hire basis—a method of bringing income to the company that is still used today through their Gun For Hire division. In 1992, they also raised $38,000 to produce their first feature, Nick Gomez's "Laws of Gravity." That film has grossed $4 million to date, and it turned a film co-op into a legitimate indy production company.

Over the next four years TSG produced another 16 feature films, 10 of them self-financed by a network of direct investors who still fund their projects today. Those films included Gomez's "New Jersey Drive," and "Illtown," Gosse's "Niagara, Niagara" and Thornton's "Sling Blade." Their largest budget to date has been $6 million, and Meistrich swears no film Shooting Gallery finances without additional backers will ever cost more than eight. "We're capped budgetarily on what we could put of our own money into a film. We made the decision a long time ago to protect ourselves from ourselves," Meistrich states. TSG currently has a two year first-look deal with New Line to co-finance films that are more expensive than $8 million.

"We are really set up in a very simple, common sense way," Meistrich says. "Money and art are two completely separate things. We know this can is worth 10 cents," he adds, indicating his ever-present can of Dr. Pepper, "so we have to make it for eight. If somebody buys it for 20, that's a bonus, but we have to get 10 to stay in business. When we budget a project, we come up with a number—what the genre, cast and filmmaker are worth—so we'll get 10 cents for our eight. The director has final cut, cast approval, script approval, music approval—it's his movie. We say, 'Here's the deal: You respect my money, you have all those things. As soon as you go over budget you've lost them.' I haven't watched dailies in four years. I'll see the movie when the director asks me to, and he doesn't have to listen to my opinion. It's his job to make it good, with our guidance and help if he wants it. Ultimately, it's his name and his career, because I've made my margin the day we started. I know what we're selling it for."

When asked if he knew "Sling Blade" would be the project that really put the company on the map, Meistrich responds frankly. "Not in the script stage. It was a great script, and I had a gut feeling about Billy, but when I was at the mix, I said this movie deserves an Oscar. I actually won a bet on that. To me, Billy's at another level than most people, and you could sense that on set. But I'm one of those people who tries to tell the truth, I have no idea what's going to be successful or not. We try to make films that are good stories, and that we like. I think we have decent taste, but sometimes they're average, and sometimes it rained two weeks and you had to change things around. There's just a million things that affect the quality of a film that you can't control.

"'Sling Blade' was as much luck as it was talent," he continues." It didn't rain, everybody got along, nobody got hurt or sick. Billy's from [the shooting location], and we got a tremendous amount of stuff for free—probably a million bucks of just free stuff and that all played into the success of the film. It gives you money for extra toys, tools and time."

TSG has and will continue to make films in a variety of genres. According to Meistrich the two factors most important in choosing a project are the story and "first and foremost a certain level of commitment from the person bringing it to us, starting with Nick Gomez who lived in the cutting room during 'Laws of Gravity' because he was so broke. 'Sling Blade' not only meant a tremendous amount to Billy personally, but the limb that he went out on professionally... If the character had come off like some cheesy Gump imitation he would have been a laughingstock. I respect that level of risk and commitment.

"We've really been able to build a company around our production skills," he concludes, "and we can deal with filmmakers in a way that isn't obnoxious, because I can give creative alternatives to a problem instead of just saying no. If we're trying to build a name brand for our company, it's really as simple as having people not feel ripped off when they leave the theatre. Not every film is going to reach the height of a 'Sling Blade,' but you shouldn't be pissed off that you spent 8 bucks to see it."

LIVE WIRE

Indie Producer/Distributor Live Has New Lease on Life

by Jon Matsumoto

When Roger Burlage joined Live Entertainment in 1994 as president and chief executive officer, the Van Nuys, Calif.-based company was an ailing video distributor in Chapter 11. Three CEOs had come and went in the five years since the 1989 death of founder Jose Menendez (a crime for which sons Lyle and Erik were convicted). Burlage eased the company's debt by selling a record chain and a European video operation.

Today, Live says it's the largest full-service film independent. It now has film, home video, TV and international in-house distribution divisions as well as being involved in production. And it has a new parent: This April, Burlage helped engineer the sale of Live to a private investor group led by Chicago-based Richland Gordon & Co., which reportedly paid at least $150 million in cash and assumed debt.

B.O. RX: James Spader stars in Sidney Lumet's "Critical Care," which Live is releasing wide this November.

The deal gives Live a financial boost to compete in the current indie marketplace—an aim that required the company to enter film production and distribution given the dearth of product available for its video distribution network. "We had to go into [film production]," says Elliot Slutzky, Live's executive vice president of theatrical distribution and marketing. "This company was a video company prior to that, and all Live did was secure video rights to various titles. That business is going away, because any studio that's going to invest in a motion picture and invest what it's going to take to bring it to the marketplace is going to have to have video rights. In order to survive, we had to produce our own product."

LIVE TRIO: Pres./CEO Roger Burlage; Elliott Slutzky, executive vice president; and Steve Rothenberg, sr. VP/domestic distribution.

Live also realized that procuring top-tier indie films for distribution was becoming a more difficult process. Slutzky points out that major studios are now eager to snap up quality independent features following the success of such small films as "Shine" and "Sling Blade." "It's harder and harder to get quality films when the majors are out there with their big bucks gobbling everything up," he says.

Still, Live management believes there is a place for feisty and smart independent film companies in the land of the giants, particularly since space has opened up with indies Miramax and New Line now operating under the aegis of conglomerates. Slutzky feels that $100 million blockbuster movies will continue to be the main priorities of the big studios, and in this atmosphere low-budget fare can sometimes get lost in the shuffle—leaving an opening for operations like Live.

According to Steve Rothenberg, senior vice president of domestic theatrical distribution, to succeed Live must avoid going head-to-head with mega-movies like "The Lost World"—i.e., it will sit out the summer and Christmas crushes. "What's helped is that exhibition has essentially increased in the past few years in terms of the number of screens and the number of megaplexes," Rothenberg says. "They obviously want good product. Domestically, our game plan is to give them good viable product, especially during the times when the majors won't be supplying them with their big mega-hits. We're going to try to supply films in months like September, October, November, January, February, March and April.

"Our strength is, we can give exhibitors the product when they need it, during the off-season when they have 24 screens" and no blockbusters to occupy multiple screens.

Live has been producing its own films for the past several years. Last year, its "The Substitute" and "The Arrival" were distributed through Orion. This fall, Live will release a diverse slate. "Suicide Kings," a black comedy starring Christopher Walken, debuts in mid-September; frightmeister Wes Craven's "Wishmaster" opens in October; and Sidney Lumet's "Critical Care," a satirical drama about the state of health care, will open in November. (Also, this August, Live hopes to make an impact with the 10th anniversary re-release of "Dirty Dancing," a Patrick Swayze title for which Live sells about 500,000 videocassette copies annually. The movie will be presented in 25 U.S. cities in exclusive or semi-exclusive engagements; new prints with digitally remastered soundtracks have been struck.)

Live plans to produce seven to 10 films each year, most with budgets of $5 million to $10 million but some that cost more. ("The Arrival," for example, cost about $20 million.) Niche audiences will remain a target. "We hope to make a film or two a year that will appeal to an African-American audience," Rothenberg says. "We certainly think that's a niche that's viable. We have a film [like that] called 'The Real' set for Martin Luther King weekend."

Live will also continue to acquire rights to three or four indie films produced elsewhere. This spring, the company landed North American rights to "Tarzan and Jane," a Village Roadshow production, and Live took domestic rights to "Standing Knockdown," a film that Mario Van Peebles will star in and direct.

"We're hoping with the influx of cash from the new owners that we'll be able to continue releasing films with the big P&A budgets that we've had in the past with 'The Arrival' and 'The Substitute' through Orion," Rothenberg says. "We'll continue to do that with 'Wishmaster' and 'Critical Care.' That's money that's desperately needed by any company if its film is to be heard through the noise of all the other films out there. So in that respect we feel we'll only benefit by the new ownership."

FIRST BORN

Art-House Distributor First Look Adopts Cautious Challenges

by Sean O'Neill

Spend time talking with Ellen Little, president, co-chair and co-CEO of First Look Pictures, and it quickly becomes apparent she favors two words in conversation—words that define her company.

The first is "challenge." A fast glance at the indie distributor's projects over its first four years of operation—e.g., the hypercomplex talkfest "The Designated Mourner," the male prostitute-themed "johns," and the Vietnamese-language "The Scent of Green Papaya" (a film that Little's husband, co-chair Robert, likened to "watching paint dry")—seem anything but safe choices in today's marketplace.

The second is "caution." Although First Look, first during the tenure of co-founder Ray Price and now during that of senior vice president of domestic distribution and marketing MJ Peckos, has gained a reputation for taking on difficult properties, the company never makes an acquisition without plenty of strategizing—simply, who will see this film?

A division of the Littles' Overseas Filmgroup, First Look launched in 1993. "My husband Rob and I," Little says, "being of the age group that was brought up on foreign-language films—Fellini, Antonioni, Truffaut—[means] this is something we have a great affinity for. Having lived in Italy for 15 years, we felt a great frustration when we moved back here in 1980 that there wasn't a bigger market for foreign-language films. That was one of the things that led us to opening our own domestic distribution operation.

"Also, we felt that it would attract talent to our company," Little continues. "Because our primary business is the sale of films overseas, and with the video market dying, we felt that it was really important to release films ourselves and to find films that we thought were marketable—like "The Secret of Roan Inish," which is a wonderful film but one that everyone had passed on because they weren't sure how to market it. But First Look figured it out and turned it into a success."

"As we got involved in distribution, we realized that this specialized marketplace was a very interesting and challenging one. When MJ came aboard, we became interested in finding films that were a challenge to market or that we thought had a special appeal to audiences that respond to our kinds of films."

So what exactly defines a First Look film? The company's release slate has been esoteric, as some other titles indicate: "Antonia's Line," which like "The Scent of Green Papaya" won an Oscar for best foreign-language film; "Party Girl," a sweetly twisted tale of a hard-partying librarian; "Infinity," a romance that was Matthew Broderick's directing debut; and "Bitter Sugar," about life in contemporary Havana.

The one throughline for these films would seem to be Little's varied tastes, but she explains the company's choices this way: "We can't get into a bidding war with Miramax or New Line on a project. So either we have to come into a project early on, or we see something that everyone else is iffy about.

NEVER RESTS: Always on the lookout for new product, First Look has acquired "The Other Side of Sunday."

"We can't always have a boxoffice hit with every challenge that we face. But we have to give it a try, and certainly each of the films we've distributed has been a puzzle in and of itself. That's where we count to a great extent on the critics to help promote the films we pick, and we just have to hope that they'll see what we see in a film. Sometimes we'll get some of them but not all. On 'Roan Inish,' I think we got practically every critic. On 'The Scent of Green Papaya,' I think one critic liked it."

Of course, some challenges are more surmountable than others, Little says. "There are certain films where we see that there's a built-in market, like for the gay audience, and we like to support films we feel are meaningful in that respect and also, most of all, are well made."

Indeed, First Look pictures do have a common element: All are small in budget but not in spirit. Each is an idiosyncratic work, an expression of a filmmaker who has an original and undiluted vision. In a word, each are "independent" films. Of course, with such acquisitions as Goldwyn and Orion by MGM and of October by Universal, the original meaning of "independent film" has been changing.

Yet in that Little sees opportunity. "There aren't that many truly independent distribution companies left, and I think that puts us in a unique situation. With the Miramaxes and Octobers and Sony Classics all being hooked up with majors, that allows them to have much deeper pockets than we do. But it also means they're inevitably getting involved in bigger pictures. That leaves us an open road into new talent, finding and procuring new talent, and giving those filmmakers the kind of attention that only we can give." Adds Peckos, "We release six to eight movies a year, so we're really able to devote a great deal of time to each picture."

It might not have a Dow 30 titan for a corporate parent, but First Look is hardly penniless. Overseas last year merged with Entertainment/Media Acquisition Corp., a Wall Street investment group, so First Look has the financial wherewithal to enter more projects at the script stage. Yet the bankroll hasn't substantially affected how First Look does business. "Nothing has really changed in terms of the way we pick a picture, or our caution in selecting a picture and going ahead with it," Little says. "If anything, now having shareholders, the responsibility we feel has been heightened." That's not a surprise, coming from the woman who runs a cautious company that thrives on challenges.

GEORGIA ON MY MIND

ShowSouth Brings Southern Hospitality to Exhibitors

by the ShowSouth Administration

"Hush Your Mouth, It's ShowSouth! The Best Little Theatre Convention in Dixie!"

As chairman of ShowSouth, I wish to extend to all fellow exhibitors and showmen my personal Southern invitation to come see us, yah heah? Experience what Southern hospitality is all about with a little golf, Southern cooking, and fun with old and new friends, way down in Dixie.

Looking forward to seeing you in Georgia at the 1997 biggest and best ever ShowSouth. I wish to thank all our sponsors and program participants who have continued to generously support ShowSouth. All good wishes. Best regards, —John Hardwick Stembler Jr.

Chairman, ShowSouth

Georgia theatre owners have served movie patrons for over 85 years. Many of the Georgia exhibitors in years past worked long and hard to form theatre associations that eventually became the local branch of NATO (National Association of Theatre Owners). John Stembler Sr., Carl Patrick Sr. and Nat Williams pushed to start NATO of Georgia, which is the primary organizer of today's ShowSouth.

NATO of Georgia's first president was Tommy Thompson of Hawkinsville, who at that time was president of the M&T (Martin and Thompson) theatre circuit. Tommy served as president for over 20 years and started Georgia's first local conventions, later joined by Alabama and Tennessee. This regional show became well-known for its workshops and seminars in the early 1970s, and hosted the NATO national convention in Atlanta.

With such new young showmen as Bill Stembler, John Thompson, George Lefont, Nat Williams, Barron Godbee, John Stembler Jr., and James Edwards, NATO of Georgia reached out. With the help of Alabama's Rufus Davis; Tennessee's H.P. Vinson and Leon DeLosier; North and South Carolina's Herman Stone and Ulmer Eaddy; and the late Jack Mitchell of Florida, the regional convention called Southeastern NATO was formed. Attendance eventually grew to 500 with locations rotating among the participating states. Jack Mitchell held a great show in Orlando, Bill Stembler in Savannah, Rufus Davis in Port Clear and Fred Massey in Nashville.

However, times were changing and independent exhibitors gave way to big mergers. Local shows gave way to ShoWest and ShowEast.

In 1993, Variety Club of Georgia moved their annual golf fundraiser to Callaway Gardens Resort in Pine Mountain, Georgia. Many old friends getting together in a successful event started a move to bring back NATO of Georgia. Meeting at Callaway in 1994, 10 exhibitors got together and elected officers: Bill Stembler, chairman of the board; George Lefont, president; Bob Sedlak, vice president; Rick Adams, secretary; Dennis Merton, treasurer; and John Stembler Jr., delegate at large. This was the beginning of the current ShowSouth, with its slogan "Hush Your Mouth, It's ShowSouth! The Best Little Theatre Convention in Dixie!"

ShowSouth has grown to a projected attendance of 200 for 1997. Backed by film companies and equipment suppliers, ShowSouth has been helping educate theatre personnel to better serve the moviegoing public. Seminars and workshops will be offered on concessions and other important topics.

This year's show will be held on Tuesday, August 19 and Wednesday, August 20. The programs will include an address by National NATO president Bill Kartozian, who will brief us on industry concerns and achievements. There will be a panel of exhibitor relations representatives from 10 film companies showing their upcoming products and promotional ideas. Coca-Cola and ShowSouth will have a motivational speaker to help enlighten theatre personnel in areas of concession sales and employee courtesy.

Two years ago, ShowSouth started a fund to award $1,000 scholarships to deserving employees from theatres in the South. These will be awarded Wednesday during the luncheon. ShowSouth will also present its annual Statesman Award to James Edwards, former president of Storey Theatres. Past Statesman Award winners include Ulmer Eaddy, Barron Godbee and Kip Smiley Sr.

So, as you can see, ShowSouth is growing into a must-attend event. Enjoy great food and old friends at a world-famous resort. We welcome you to join us for the convention and then to stay on for Golf Fest '97, Variety Club's 28th Annual Event.

See you at Callaway for ShowSouth, A Southern Tradition...Alive and Growing!

Q&A: STEMBLER SINGS SONG OF SHOWSOUTH

You know about ShoWest and ShowEast.* BOXOFFICE*'s coverage of ShowCanada introduced you to what could be called ShowNorth. Now, John Stembler Jr., vice president of Georgia Theatre Co. and chairman of ShowSouth, tells us why his upcoming convention in Pine Mountain, Ga. is "The Best Little Theatre Convention in Dixie."

BOXOFFICE: How long has ShowSouth been around?

JOHN STEMBLER JR.: It got going in the '70s, then it went to the mid-'80s, through about '85.

BOXOFFICE: Why did it stop?

STEMBLER: Because all the circuits were sold out. The Gulf States Theatres was sold to United Artists; Georgia Theatre Co. was sold to United Artists; Fairlane-Litchfield Theatres out of the Carolinas was sold to United Artists.

BOXOFFICE: So what happened after that? Did you start the circuit back up again then?

STEMBLER: My brother Bill and I opened Value Cinemas in Florida in '88 or '89. And then we bought back some South Georgia theatres around '91. So [Georgia Theatre Co.] had been out of business [in Georgia] five years at that point. And then we had a partner in the Carolinas, and we had some over there.

BOXOFFICE: Now there's a resurgence of indies, and that's why ShowSouth started back up again three years ago?

STEMBLER: We moved the Variety Club golf tournament we'd been having that we started 28 years ago to Callaway Gardens. And everybody seemed to like that. So we said, as long as we're having that, why don't we have a theatre meeting like we used to, in conjunction with the golf tournament? We have all our managers come in from around the state for this thing. And of course we pay for them. And they deserve it. We think they ought to be rewarded for working hard all year, and this is a good opportunity to do that. This makes them feel part of a larger thing, like the industry. The convention creates a little excitement and entertainment, and makes them feel a part of the whole. And I think that has real value.

And we like the social interaction. The big conventions have gotten so big that it's difficult to really spend any time visiting with folks like at receptions or barbecues or dinners or whatever, golfing events. This gives people an opportunity to sort of socialize a little bit, I mean, the idea of Southern hospitality. To slow down and take it easy. Everything now is systematized, computerized and dehumanized. So I think it's valuable for some people to see who they're talking to.

BOXOFFICE: How many people do you expect to attend?

STEMBLER: Around 200 or so. Which is fine. We're not trying to be the biggest. We're the Best Little Theatre Convention in Dixie.

BOXOFFICE: I've heard that rumor!

STEMBLER: But it is fun because Callaway Gardens is a pretty place. They've got a butterfly house and extensive gardens and two or three golf courses and swimming pools and lakes and all sorts of things, and a lot of trees. We've got pine trees for 80 miles between the airport and the place. And the name of the town is Pine Mountain, Georgia.

BOXOFFICE: Did you say a butterfly room?

STEMBLER: Yeah, there's like a greenhouse full of butterflies. There's something for the ladies to do and for non-golfers to do.

BOXOFFICE: Do you have some seminars?

STEMBLER: Oh yes, we've got 10 film company representatives coming in, the exhibitor relations people going over the product. They did that last year, and that was well-received. So it's really worth anybody's time to come just to get that, because it talks about new pictures, promotions, ad campaigns, all kind of tie-ins, specialized stuff. And the president of NATO, Bill Kartozian, will kick off the meeting, and he'll let us know what the latest is on the legislative front and issues in Washington, or anything that's pertinent to the movie theatre business.

BOXOFFICE: What are the differences between ShowSouth and the bigger conventions?

STEMBLER: To me, [the big shows are] sort of like a cattle drive, because it's so fast. You're sort of herded in these different events, and there's so many people that it's kind of hard to socialize or talk to people, because everybody's going to the next event. I think that some of these other things have gotten to be—I don't want to make any derogatory comments, because I go and I like them. [But] this deal is a lot more laid back. It's pastoral. It's down-home. We don't have a lot of neon and all the rest of that stuff. And I mean, I like that, that's showbiz too. But I think people will find this a nice contrast.—Christine James

CAREER GIRLS ★★★★★

Starring Katrin Cartlidge and Lynda Steadman. Directed and written by Mike Leigh. Produced by Simon Channing-Williams. An October release. Comedy/drama. Rated R for language and some sexuality. Running time: 91 min. Opens 8/8 NY/LA, 8/15 expands.

Writer/director Mike Leigh has once again assembled an amazing cast to render a spectrum of human emotions beyond the range of most filmmakers' reach. Lynda Steadman is the wispy-voiced, quavery, anxiety-ridden Annie (reminiscent of Brenda Blethyn's character in Leigh's "Secrets & Lies"), and Katrin Cartlidge (a Leigh veteran from "Naked") is unforgettable as Hannah, an idiosyncratic character who's sharp-tongued, sharp-witted, sharp-angled and always good-humored, if with a psychotic tinge.

The film begins with Annie embarking on a trip to visit Hannah, whom she hasn't seen since graduating from university six years ago. The reunion is interspliced with flashbacks to the late 1980s (effectively depicted, with appropriate costuming and music), when the pair first met in college.

Leigh is a master at capturing oblique layers of complex emotion, particularly insecurity and the discomfort of feeling out-of-place. Annie and Hannah, both of whom have mellowed and matured in the intervening decade, are glad to see each other, but there is a palpable yet subtle awkwardness, owing to the rift of time since they've seen one another, as well as to their disparate natures, which made their friendship an unlikely one in the first place. All this is artfully conveyed, with Leigh never having to articulate these sentiments with words.

The two women soon begin to recapture the closeness they developed years before as they spend a day traveling through London househunting for Hannah. On their trek, they coincidentally—or synchronistically—encounter key figures from their past. The story neatly unravels to show how these people have affected Hannah and Annie's lives, both then and now.

Like much of Leigh's work, "Career Girls" is an unflinching look at the lives of lonely, alienated but everyday (if notably eccentric) people that evolves uplliftingly from despair to hope, buoyed throughout with clever humor. Cartlidge and Steadman accomplish Leigh's vision with incredibly spot-on portrayals of these compellingly unique protagonists.—Christine James

CANNES DO!

More 50th Cannes coverage from the Croisette

L.A. CONFIDENTIAL ★★★1/2

Starring Kevin Spacey, Russell Crowe and Kim Basinger. Directed by Curtis Hanson. Written by Brian Helgeland and Curtis Hanson. Produced by Arnon Milchan, Curtis Hanson and Michael Nathanson. A Warner Bros. release. Drama. Rated R for strong violence and language, and for sexuality. Running time: 135 min. Opens 10/3.

Adapted from the novel by James Ellroy, Curtis Hanson's dark and moody "L.A. Confidential" is a top-notch thriller, an intricate tale of corruption, lust and betrayal that thematically recalls vintage film noir while stylistically coming closer to Roman Polanski's "Chinatown." That said, though, the movie has a voice of its own, distinguished by some imaginative casting.

Two Australian actors, Russell Crowe ("Rough Magic") and Guy Pearce ("The Adventures of Priscilla, Queen of the Desert") are downright unrecognizable as police detectives in 1950s Los Angeles, trading witty barbs and clever retorts in perfect American accents. Crowe in particular exudes noir appeal; he's like a latter-day Robert Mitchum from "Out of the Past," all jaded cynicism and smoky secrets.

As the girl with a past, Kim Basinger looks radiant and has her best part in ages; she's a perfect femme fatale counterpart to Crowe's weary detective. Kevin Spacey, as an unctuous celebrity cop, does a memorable turn, as do James Cromwell ("Babe") as a seemingly wise police captain and Danny DeVito as an overzealous editor of a celebrity gossip rag (aptly dubbed "Hush-Hush"). Acting, dialogue and production values are all superb. What doesn't work so well, however, is the narrative. With a story so convoluted you don't know who's coming or going, it's hard to keep track of plot points; before you know it, in true noir style, just about everyone ends up dead. Would that we knew why.—Lael Loewenstein

THE END OF VIOLENCE ★★★

Starring Bill Pullman, Andie MacDowell, Gabriel Byrne, Loren Dean, Traci Lind and Daniel Benzali. Directed by Wim Wenders. Written by Nicholas Klein. Produced by Deepak Nayar, Wim Wenders and Nicholas Klein. An MGM release. Drama. Not yet rated. Running time: 123 min. Opens 9/12.

Leave it to Wim Wenders to make a film about violence...without violence.

Like many previous Wenders films, most notably the recent "Lisbon Story" (yet to be released stateside), "The End of Violence" stations itself somewhere between a philosophical meditation and an old-fashioned detective mystery. This kind of dualistic fusion has never worked particularly well for Wenders, although here it works well enough to at least get its message across.

The ensemble piece revolves primarily around movie producer Mike Max (Bill Pullman), whose ultra-violent epics hit home when he's kidnapped and nearly murdered by bungling killers. After escaping under uncertain circumstances, Max goes underground. Clues to the caper turn up with a surveillance expert (Gabriel Byrne) while testing a secret citywide network of video cameras. As events steadily move the two men closer to solving the mystery, other characters become entangled: Max's dissatisfied wife (Andie MacDowell), a young detective (Loren Dean) and a stuntwoman-turned-actress (Traci Lind).

The resolution of the "mystery" is considerably less than satisfying, especially in light of the careful and deliberate setup. Wenders' choice to allow all of the story's violence to occur offscreen, though interesting in concept, is odd in execution and underscores the film's overall lack of dramatic energy. But observations and subtextual commentary about violence in America are well-nuanced in Nicholas Klein's script, affording Wenders a chance to philosophize less obtrusively yet no less effectively than before.—Wade Major

THE SWEET HEREAFTER ★★★★

Starring Ian Holm, Sarah Polley and Maury Chaykin. Directed and written by Atom Egoyan. Produced by Camelia Frieberg and Atom Egoyan. A Fine Line release. Drama. Not yet rated. Running time: 100 min. Won the Grand Jury Prize, the Ecumenical Prize and the Fipresci Critics Prize. Opens 10/10.

One of the few films to be widely praised at this year's fest, Atom Egoyan's "The Sweet Hereafter" garnered several key prizes. A stirring portrait of a community struggling to heal after a crisis, the film—based on the novel by Russell Banks—is distinguished by an array of fine performances, Egoyan's signature evocative camera work, and a story that leaves one thinking without heavy-handed moralizing.

In a Canadian town, a school bus crash has left dozens of children dead. Some people want to lay blame; others mourn quietly. A big-city lawyer ("The Fifth Element's" Ian Holm) arrives looking for clients and promising riches, dividing the townspeople further. Then a survivor's crisis of conscience brings her to a momentous decision that will lead her to the "sweet hereafter," a realm for those at peace with their fate.

Holm is superb, worming his way into the grieving families' homes with slippery charm and inflated promises. Compelled to speak, the residents each narrate their different versions of events in intriguing "Rashomon" style, and Egoyan weaves together the various voiceover narrations into a richly detailed quilt of subjective impressions, memories and beliefs. He varies the texture by juxtaposing intimate close-ups of characters speaking with sweeping aerial shots of the bus speeding toward its demise. Most importantly, "The Sweet Hereafter" manages to impart a moral without delivering a sermon. A call to individual as well as community responsibility, it is a particularly apt tale in an era of lawsuits and finger-pointing.—Lael Loewenstein

THE TASTE OF CHERRY ★★1/2

Starring Homayon Ershadi and Abdolrahman Bagheri. Directed, written and produced by Abbas Kiarostami. No stateside distributor set. Drama. Iranian-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 103 min. Co-won Palme d'Or.

"The Taste of Cherry" ("Ta'm E Guilass") had been withdrawn from Cannes by Iranian authorities because of its subject matter: suicide. After the fest opened, the government relented, and the film tied for the top prize. No stranger to controversy, director/writer Abbas Kiarostami ("Under the Olive Trees") also wrote the screenplay for "The White Balloon," another film that found detractors in its homeland.

In "The Taste of Cherry," as Badii (Homayon Ershadi) gives people rides, he tells them life has been painful and he believes suicide will "liberate" him. Only a museum guard (Abdolrahman Bagheri) has the sympathy to consider helping: He talks about simple pleasures like the taste of a cherry that Badii would never again experience.

Although Ershadi's performance gives a clear sense of Badii's anguish, the screenplay does not give the character enough personal details to make him compelling. The film has the minimalist style and simple storyline common to many other Iranian films, but Kiarostami's direction is not only uncompromising but also unvarying and severe: Most of the film is a series of static conversations. When Badii does leave the car, he is dwarfed by mountains, emphasizing his sense of insignificance. And a documentary-like conclusion is distracting and spoils the poignancy achieved when Badii makes his decision.—Ed Scheid

Starring John Travolta, Sean Penn and Robin Wright Penn. Directed by Nick Cassavetes. Written by John Cassavetes. Produced by Rene Cleitman. A Miramax release. Drama. Rated R for strong language and some violence. Running time: 100 min. Won the Best Actor prize. Opens 8/15.

Other than Penn's award-winning portrayal of Eddie, a half-mad alcoholic crazy in love with his wife Maureen (real-life wife Robin Wright Penn), there's very little redeeming about "She's So Lovely." Scripted by the late John Cassavetes and directed by his son Nick ("Unhook the Stars"), the film feels like the cinematic equivalent of a Jackson Pollock painting; it's as if scenes of doomed people arguing were splattered on the screen randomly. While John Cassavetes' cinema verite style might have been better suited to adapting his own script, in Nick's relatively untested hands serious scenes are so overdone they become funny.

Searching for Eddie from bar to bar—and getting raped along the way—Maureen finds him in a dive. They fight, make love, dance, then fight again—until Eddie goes so far off the deep end that Maureen has him committed. Ten years later, Maureen is married (apparently happily) to wealthy Joey (John Travolta) and has three kids. When Maureen learns Eddie is out, she decides to go back to him: "I love him more." Soon Eddie, two friends (Debi Mazar and Harry Dean Stanton), Maureen and Joey are tumbling, screaming, and wielding guns on Joey's lawn as romantic music plays.

Except for Penn, just about everyone here overacts egregiously. Wright Penn's overdone New York accent recalls Barbra Streisand in "Funny Girl"—surely not the intended association—and Travolta mocks his tough-guy turns. "She's So Lovely" is supposedly a "romantic fable," but most moviegoers will be so turned off by these despicable characters that "morality tale" is closer to the truth.—Lael Loewenstein

NIL BY MOUTH ★★★

Starring Ray Winstone, Charlie Creed-Miles and Cathie Burke. Directed and written by Gary Oldman. Produced by Luc Besson, Douglas Urbanski and Gary Oldman. A Sony Classics release. Drama. Not yet rated. Running time: 128 min. Won Best Actress prize. Opens Feb. 1998.

Gary Oldman has worked with some of the best and most commercial directors in Hollywood, so it may come as a surprise to some that his semi-autobiographical directing/writing debut instead casts a nod to the work of gritty English realists like Stephen Frears, Mike Leigh and Ken Loach. But gritty English realism is where Oldman honed his craft, and his bow here, though imperfect, does the tradition proud.

A sort of South London version of "Once Were Warriors," "Nil by Mouth" centers on a working-class English family, consisting of a thuggish oaf named Ray (Ray Winstone), his world-weary wife Valerie (Cathie Burke) and Valerie's junkie brother Billy (Charlie Creed-Miles). Photographed in gritty, hand-held super 16mm, Oldman's portrait is a harsh one, pulling no punches as it shows the violence, profanity, blood and tears that there constitute daily life.

Elsewhere, the film fails to live up to its emotional billing, with Oldman allowing scenes to drag on far longer than necessary. The script's episodic nature is also problematic, but audiences might warm to the approach as they grow accustomed to the characters. Other noteworthy contributions include Eric Clapton's warmly subdued score and colorful supporting players, plus agile "on the zoom" work by cinematographer Ron Fortunato.—Wade Major

KICKED IN THE HEAD ★★

Starring Kevin Corrigan and Linda Fiorentino. Directed by Matthew Harrison. Written by Kevin Corrigan and Matthew Harrison. Produced by Barbara De Fina. An October Films release. Comedy. Rated R for strong language, drug content, some sex and brief violence. Run time: 87 min. Opens 9/12 NY/LA, 9/19 exp.

stellar cast or its Martin Scorsese (who executive produces) pedigree can redeem this tale of a lower Manhattan loser (Kevin Corrigan) on a series of misadventures.

Over a frenetic four days, he fends off his ex-girlfriend ("I Shot Andy Warhol's" Lili Taylor) and nutty uncle (James Woods), romances a fiesty flight attendant (Linda Fiorentino), dodges his slippery friend Stretch ("Metro's" Michael Rapaport) and barely avoids a shootout. He also waxes philosophical on the Hindenburg crash, fortune cookies and "Planet of the Apes."

What it all means is anybody's guess. Corrigan plays hapless well, but he fails to sparkle; ditto Fiorentino, playing another ice queen. On the positive side, Woods is memorably wacky, and the camera work is impressively sharp. Alas, not sharp enough to save the film.—Lael Loewenstein

MRS. BROWN ★★★★1/2

Judi Dench, Billy Connolly, Geoffrey Palmer and Anthony Sher. Directed by John Madden. Written by Jeremy Brock. Produced by Sarah Curtis. A Miramax release. Drama. Rated PG for a beating, language and brief nudity. Running time: 103 min.

Since the day when Shakespeare first put pen to paper, the English monarchy and drama have been gloriously intertwined, and nowhere with more aplomb and majesty than in the cinema. Director John Madden's magnificent "Mrs. Brown," however, stands as more than just another addition to the catalog. With grace, wit and unerring sensitivity, this literate telling of Queen Victoria's scandalous friendship with loyal Scottish servant John Brown is one of the finest and most human portraits of any monarch ever to grace the screen.

Despite similarities to "The Madness of King George" and "Carrington," "Mrs. Brown" succeeds on its own terms, owing much to freshman scribe Jeremy Brock's fine blending of fact and speculation. Madden is also in peak form, rebounding from "Ethan Frome" and "Golden Gate."

The engine that drives the film, of course, is the chemistry between its leads, and here they could find themselves contending for Oscars. Although the casting of stage legend Judi Dench opposite madcap comic Billy Connolly might seem eccentric, the pair collide with an elegance and passion not seen since O'Toole and Hepburn in "The Lion in Winter."—Wade Major

MA VIE EN ROSE ★★★★

Starring Michele Laroque, Jean-Philippe Ecoffey and Georges du Fresne. Directed by Alain Berliner. Written by Chris Vander Stappen and Alain Berliner. Produced by Carole Scotta. A Sony Classics release. Comedy. Not yet rated. Running time: 89 min. Opens Feb. 1998.

The first film by Belgian director Alain Berliner, "Ma Vie en Rose" is a scathingly funny, brutally critical commentary on gender roles and bourgeois thinking that turned out to be one of Cannes' unexpected delights. Just moved to the suburbs, married Hanna (Michele Laroque) and Pierre (Jean-Philippe Ecoffey) have only one problem: Their nine-year-old son Ludovic (Georges du Fresne, a revelation) thinks he's a girl.

Berliner's film is a triumph on several levels. He deftly renders his cinematic suburbia at once real and surreal, with a tone that manages to be both hilarious and affecting. Amid a color palette of extremes—cotton candy-pink dresses, an electric blue sky—Berliner's characters exist in a Magritte paradise. Clever camera techniques and bold cinematography underscore the unique tone: High-angle shots lend an air of precipitousness, while over-the-shoulder shots provide a sense of depth in a seemingly shallow world. Contrapuntally, the heightened look of the film comedically undercuts the potentially serious nature of Ludovic's dilemma.

Yet Berliner also draws a moving portrait of a family in crisis with a well-played role reversal between the parents. Hanna, initially her son's fervent supporter, crumbles under the social pressure and loses her patience with him; Pierre, at first threatened by Ludovic's behavior, later softens into gentle understanding. "Ma Vie en Rose" is a rare gem: a comedy/drama with crossover potential, sure to appeal as much to gay audiences as straight ones.—Lael Loewenstein

Starring Mira Sorvino, Jeremy Northam, Charles S. Dutton and Josh Brolin. Directed by Guillermo Del Toro. Written by John Sayles, Matthew Greenberg, W. Peter Iliff and Matthew Robbins. Produced by Bob Weinstein and B.J. Rack. A Miramax release. Horror. Rated R for terror/violence and language.

From the director of "Cronos" comes a near-future science thriller. In it, Susan Tyler (Mira Sorvino) and her husband ("The Net's" Jeremy Northam) must stop a disease from wiping out a generation. The carrier of the pediatric epidemic is the common cockroach—but, really, how common is a cockroach bigger than your palm? Unaffected by the creatures' size, a doctor casually refers to one as "just a baby."

The speed of the narrative early on is such that anyone not paying close attention will be lost throughout the remainder. A collaboration of writers on this film ruined what could have been a great thriller. Along with trying to conjure terror by rehashing horror-flick cliches, they occasionally slow the brisk pace to a crawl to let scenes sink in before the next jolt. Although close-up special effects are good, "Mimic" is a mere appetizer for hungry hard-core horror fans. Then again, for more squeamish soft-core buffs, the film will shoot the occasional chill up their spines.—Dwayne E. Leslie

GEORGE OF THE JUNGLE ★1/2

Starring Brendan Fraser, Leslie Mann and Thomas Hayden Church. Voice by John Cleese. Directed by Sam Weisman. Written by Dana Olsen and Audrey Wells. Produced by David Hoberman, Jordan Kerner and Jon Avnet. A Buena Vista release. Comedy. Rated PG for crude humor and mild violence, language and sensuality.

It's been a quarter-century since Jay Ward's animated "George of the Jungle" shorts swung onto TV. Via today's Cartoon Network, the nostalgic character's show (also featuring Super Chicken and Tom Slick) has been revived. And, via Disney, the loinclothed gent travels along vines to Hollywood for his first live-action feature.

In this adventure, George (Brendan Fraser, who played the neanderthal in "Encino Man") gets to rescue his true love, Ursula ("The Cable Guy's" Leslie Mann) from a lion, from a bad marriage proposal made by a most ineligible bachelor (Thomas Hayden Church) and from her parents. Then, for the first time, he leaves the jungle and goes to the civilized big city, where comic consternation with all its modern appliances awaits—until he must return to the wilds to save his mentor, Ape (who's voiced by John Cleese), from poachers and have his final confrontation with Ursula's finky fiance.

George's silver-screen debut could mean something to those who grew up watching his comic antics, and the youngest moviegoers might be charmed—plus, pre-teen girls (and maybe some post-teeners) will flock to the movie to see Fraser's admirably toned body. But today's high-tech generation of young males, the movie's key demo, are unlikely to care for George. In the end, the film is a crossbreed of "Encino Man" without Pauly Shore, "Jungle 2 Jungle" without Tim Allen, and the live-action "Jungle Book" without real animals. The only resemblances to the classic cartoon are that trees still get in George's way, Shep the elephant still thinks he is a doggie, the ape named Ape still talks, and his girlfriend's name is still Ursula. But that's not enough to keep this "George" from being a bungle in the jungle.—Dwayne E. Leslie

MEN IN BLACK ★★★1/2

Starring Tommy Lee Jones, Will Smith, Vincent D'Onofrio, Rip Torn and Linda Fiorentino. Directed by Barry Sonnenfeld. Written by Ed Solomon. Produced by Walter Parkes and Laurie MacDonald. A Columbia release. SF/comedy/action. Rated PG-13 for language and sci-fi violence. Running time: 96 min.

Based on the conspiracy theory that there is a secret cadre of black-suited men whose job is to hide evidence of extraterrestrials, "Men In Black" takes this urban legend a fantastical step further. Tommy Lee Jones stars as Kay, a top MIB agent who not only conceals UFO landings but is part of a high-tech monitoring system of alien "immigrants" who take secret but legal refuge on earth. When "illegal" aliens pay our planet a visit, the MIB force must deal with them—a dangerous job of slimy battles with malevolent multi-tentacled creatures.

With his partner retired, Kay recruits a young upstart NYPD cop, Jay (Will Smith). The gruff veteran/brash rookie chemistry comes across in some comically extreme scenarios as a war-mongering, humanity-despising "bug" of an E.T. plots to destroy the world and start an intergalactic battle.

ILM's special effects are amazing, of course, but the great part is the inventive and fun ways in which the effects are used. Particularly impressive is Rick Baker's makeup for the Bug, who inhabits the body of a cantankerous farmer named Edgar (Vincent D'Onofrio). As one might imagine, the shape of a giant insect monster is significantly different from that of a human, and so it's not exactly a perfect fit when Bug puts on his "Edgar suit." Things protrude, bulge and poke; D'Onofrio's physical comedy is out-and-out hysterical. Even against such a scene-stealer, the two leads more than hold their own: Jones is dryly hilarious and Smith comically exuberant.

Still, a narrative weakness is the underexplained motivations for and ramifications of killing an alien ambassador to start a war; also, a clue involving a cat is too insultingly obvious and important. And, though there's a multitude of visual splendors, even more out-of-this-world gadgetry and a wider variety of aliens would have made the mythos feel more complete.—Christine James

Starring John Travolta, Nicolas Cage and Joan Allen. Directed by John Woo. Written by Mike Werb & Michael Colleary. Produced by David Permut, Barrie M. Osborne, Terence Chang and Christopher Godsick. A Paramount release. Action. Rated R for intense sequences of strong violence, and for strong language. Running time: 139 min.

Not as serious as Woo's Hong Kong work about love and integrity paid for by self-sacrifice ("The Killer," "Bullet in the Head"), this Douglas/Reuther-WCG Entertainment-David Permut production succeeds by using a comedic tone as it becomes as messy and complex as human life, with contradictory elements simultaneously taking up the same space. Manifesting this struggle are two fabulous actors (Nicolas Cage and John Travolta), known for having fun, taking risks and creating their own kind of antics onscreen.

To save the world, FBI agent Archer (Travolta) has himself surgically grafted with the face of a comatose enemy, the terrorist Troy (Cage). When Troy (now acted by Travolta) appears "wearing" Archer's face after destroying FBI scientists who know about the switch, the fun begins, and the clean line between good and evil disappears. Troy (with whom Travolta has a terrific time) gleefully uses his FBI powers to do harm yet protects Archer's teenage daughter (Dominique Swain) in two acutely funny scenes. Archer (now played by Cage, who has the more difficult job of displaying warring emotions within his character's mind) protects killers he once hunted, and kills law officers who now threaten him.

Arguably the best action director in the world, Woo also manages complex emotional content and a deft way with music. Woo's use of women throughout "Face/Off" is genre-busting and exceptionally good, particularly the smooth trickery of Troy by Archer's wife (Joan Allen). Woo's usual audience-pleasing details, such as extra shots of a villain reacting to his own demise, here rest with Archer in Cage's guise: Post-op, he first sees himself in Troy's face and goes nuts with regret; at Troy's final moment, Archer can't stop himself from screaming "Die!"—Karen Achenbach

Voices by Tate Donovan, Danny DeVito, James Woods, Susan Egan and Rip Torn. Directed by John Musker and Ron Clements. Written by Ron Clements & John Musker, Donald McEnery & Bob Shaw and Irene Mecchi. Produced by Alice Dewey, John Musker and Ron Clements. A Buena Vista release. Animated. Rated G. Running time: 93 min.

Disney's latest animated film takes on the tale of fabled demigod Hercules, with hit-and-myth results. In this telling, Hades (James Woods), Lord of the Underworld, plots to kill newborn Hercules. A plan to turn baby Herc human doesn't quite succeed: He's made mortal with a magic potion, yet he retains his super strength. As Hercules matures, he discovers his divine origins and strives to regain his godly status, aided by a satyr (Danny DeVito). But Hades and his minions, Pain and Panic (Bobcat Goldthwait and Matt Frewer), try to stop him at every turn, using the cynical but beautiful Megara (Susan Egan) as bait.

The audience gets to know Hercules only superficially, and there's no moment when he goes from "zero to hero." Meg is more interesting, breaking the mold of Disney heroines past, with her astringent anti-heroine attitude belying a tragic history. The overly familiar set-up—with the naive hero, sardonic villain, bumbling sidekicks, traitorous pawn, ignorant townspeople and over-simplified life lesson—lacks any real twists and turns, but some punch is provided by humorous dialogue. Woods as the ever-exasperated Hades is the comic highlight, his acrid wit balancing out some of the over-the-top feel-good elements indigenous to the genre.—Christine James

AMAZON ★★★1/2

Narrated by Linda Hunt. Directed by Kieth Merrill. A MacGillivray Freeman release. Documentary. Unrated. Running time: 40 min. Format: IMAX.

Filmed in the broad span of IMAX over more than a year in the Amazon, this documentary literally springs to life in a colorful explosion of sound and movement, taking a travelogue approach to this mysterious region of the world. Oscar-winning director Kieth Merrill ("Grand Canyon: The Hidden Secrets") provides a balanced mix of information and intrigue in this fast-moving film, including an up-close look, for the first time, at the Zoe, an isolated indigenous tribe never before shown on film.

But what makes this movie so engrossing is the way this film unfolds as the cameras follow two men of opposite cultures in their search for plants with curative powers. Mamani is a Bolivian Callawaya shaman whose journey takes him on foot from his home high up in the Andes to the dense rainforest. Just as determined but equipped with modern means is ethnobotanist Dr. Mark Plotkin, who for 20 years has been studying Indian shamans to learn the medicinal qualities of their native plants. As their stories unfold, so too does the Amazon: Covering 2.2 million square miles, it is home to more than 5,000 species of fish, hundreds of thousands of plants, scores of insects, and many native tribes who still use poisoned arrows and blowguns to dispatch their prey.

Describing each man's journey is actress Linda Hunt ("The Year of Living Dangerously"), whose gift for narration shines through here. That, combined with an evocative score that highlights the different native rhythms (from festive flutes to intense beating drums), recreates the aura of this magnificent but dangerous terrain, one of the last wild places on earth. Awe-inspiring in its depth and coverage, "Amazon's" 40 minutes fly by far too fast. Yet "Amazon" thrills and excites without losing sight of its mission: to inform and educate.—Pat Kramer

FLASHBACK: FEBRUARY, 1985
What BOXOFFICE said about...

THE COTTON CLUB

[A dozen years ago, Orion released "The Cotton Club," a big-budget spectacle that found less than spectacular boxoffice ($25.9 mil.) after its Dec. 14, 1984 debut. This August, UA releases "Hoodlum," a crime saga that shares with "The Cotton Club" its setting—between-the-wars Harlem—and several of its characters: Dutch Schultz (Tim Roth in "Hoodlum," James Remar in "The Cotton Club"), Lucky Luciano (Andy Garcia, Joe Dallesandro) and Bumpy Johnson (Laurence Fishburne, who also played the role as Bumpy Rhodes in "The Cotton Club").]

"The Cotton Club" is lavish entertainment, but it's also a movie without a center. It has some wonderfully funny moments and a whole gallery of great supporting characters. But it also has two leads—Richard Gere and Diane Lane—who add up to something less than zero. The cinematic equivalent of a black hole, the would-be romantic duo succeed in pulling down everything around them. That plus a wildly unfocused script prevent "The Cotton Club" from being a complete success. Yet, despite all these problems, Francis Coppola also supplies enough dazzling sideshows to keep the movie moving and the audience happy.

The dancing is great, the music is great, the set and costume designs are great, and all the supporting players are great. Unfortunately, audiences also have to deal with Gere and Lane, and they are not great; they're not even very good. Repeatedly, the camera cuts away from a musical number (not one at the Cotton Club is seen in its entirety) to their relationship, which is so devoid of chemistry that it brings the movie to a halt. Another, not quite as destructive problem is the scattershot approach of the script. Much has been written about producer Robert Evans' trials in getting "The Cotton Club" to the screen and the manner in which Coppola created the script as he went along. Sad to say, all of that shows up in the improvised feeling and inconsistencies of the finished product.

But it's also easy to dismiss all those faults, at least while one is watching the movie, and enjoy "The Cotton Club" for all its virtues. There're always something and someone interesting just around the corner; and, if Coppola seems to have difficulty with the story's narrative line, he does manage to help the audience keep straight the huge cast of characters.—Jimmy Summers roney) is going to ask her to live up to one of those pacts that movie characters tend to make—in which two friends agree to marry each other if they haven't met anybody else by a certain age. She gets a shock when he instead asks her to fly down for his wedding to his new love, 20-year-old co-ed Kimmy ("Head Above Water's" Cameron Diaz). At this fall-on-the-floor moment, Julianne realizes that she wants to walk down the aisle with Michael, and she decides to do whatever she can to break the duo up.

However, her match-breaking mischief is not very fun or creative; at one point, she even admits that her ill-intentioned actions were "not even inventive," which seems to be more an apology from scripter Ron Bass than anything else. Mostly, though, the film suffers from the lack of a charismatic leading man. A guy would have to be pretty irresistible to incite a woman to go to such lengths to win him, but Michael is not very exciting and even a little boorish and insensitive. Roberts and Diaz are both energetically exuberant as the dueling dames, but it's Rupert Everett ("Cemetery Man") who steals the show as Julianne's fake fiance.—Christine James

Starring George Clooney, Arnold Schwarzenegger, Chris O'Donnell, Uma Thurman and Alicia Silverstone. Directed by Joel Schumacher. Written by Akiva Goldsman. Produced by Peter Macgregor-Scott. A Warner Bros. release. Action/adventure. Rated PG-13 for strong stylized action and some innuendos. Running time: 124 min.

Where the first "Batman" had the brooding darkness of Tim Burton's harsh vision, the second had Catwoman and the third one had Jim Carrey, it's unfortunate that this fourth installment has a lot of nothing. Despite stabs at campy humor, "Batman & Robin" is repetitive, slow and messy.

In the hands of George Clooney, who lacks the dark irony of a Michael Keaton or twisted dramatics of a Val Kilmer, the Caped Crusader is but a cipher in rubber. As the evil Mr. Freeze, who leagues with the devilish Poison Ivy (Uma Thurman), Arnold Schwarzenegger seems to be the only one who's really invested in his role. Case in point: As Batgirl, Alicia Silverstone offers little more than a butt jiggle.

The sets impress but the setups are annoyingly illogical. The fight scenes are poorly choreographed and frankly yawn-inspiring. There's simply nothing at risk this time around for the batboys, and therefore nothing gained. In its place: batbabble about the importance of family.—Susan Lambert

SPEED 2: CRUISE CONTROL ★★

Starring Sandra Bullock, Jason Patric and Willem Dafoe. Directed by Jan De Bont. Written by Randall McCormick and Jeff Nathanson. Produced by Jan De Bont, Steve Perry and Michael Peyser. A Fox release. Action. Rated PG-13 for frenetic disaster action and violence. Running time: 120 min.

"'Speed' on a boat" is more doomed than the Titanic and as ill-helmed as the S.S. Minnow. Where "Speed" paved new roads in the genre, "Speed 2," about a disgruntled former employee who wreaks havoc on a cruise ship, drowns in waterlogged cliches of the milieu. This craft springs plot leaks everywhere, causing the story's interest and credibility to sink like a stone.

Jason Patric is above and beyond the call of bland as an LAPD rogue, and Sandra Bullock only semi-successfully reprises her role as the sweet but sassy Annie. Willem Dafoe as the villain is his usual compellingly demented self, but his motivation makes no sense. Finally, the rescue process kills off more people than it saves, lessening the tension by devaluing human life.—Christine James Starring Nicolas Cage, John Cusack and John Malkovich. Directed by Simon West. Written by Scott Rosenberg. Produced by Jerry Bruckheimer. A Buena Vista release. Action. Rated R for strong violence and language. Running time: 115 min.

Producer Jerry Bruckheimer's first solo outing since the passing of partner Don Simpson is basically a dressed-up retread of their last film together, "The Rock," by way of "Die Hard." But this Touchstone effort—about an ex-con (Nicolas Cage) who battles hijackers led by a mastermind (John Malkovich)—falls well below such stature, substituting bombast for believability before finally plunging headlong into the ridiculous.

Although Cage and John Cusack, as a helpful G-Man, handle their respective action hero roles well enough, it's Malkovich's wiseacre psychopath and a colorful collection of mostly cartoonish bad-guys that keep "Con Air" at cruising altitude until a climactic shootout at an abandoned airfield. Unfortunately, the shootout is only the beginning of the end, the first in a long series of climaxes and explosion-laden set pieces that stretch the film's credibility far past the breaking point. On the technical side, first-time director Simon West (presumably not a pseudonym for Jerry Bruckheimer) does a Tony Scott impression, and Scott Rosenberg ("Beautiful Girls") seamlessly integrates every imaginable action film cliche.—Wade Major

GONE FISHIN' ★

Starring Joe Pesci and Danny Glover. Directed by Christopher Cain. Written by Jill Mazursky Cody and Jeffrey Abrams. Produced by Roger Birnbaum and Julie Bergman Sender. A Buena Vista release. Comedy. Rated PG for mild violence and language. Running time: 94 min.

Comedies about fishing have never worked, not even for Howard Hawks, whose worst film was 1964's "Man's Favorite Sport?" The dictum is proven again in 1997 with "Gone Fishin'," a Hollywood/Caravan effort (held from summer 1996 release) whose lame slapstick, nonexistent plot and incompetent moviemaking should discourage anyone from trying again. What are Joe Pesci and Danny Glover doing acting like obnoxious clowns in a feeble series of misadventures? The only moment that works comes during a cameo by Willie Nelson as some sort of deus ex machina. God knows the picture needed someone to save it.—Dale Winogura

TRIAL AND ERROR ★

Starring Michael Richards and Jeff Daniels. Directed by Jonathan Lynn. Written by Sara Bernstein and Greg Bernstein. Produced by Gary Ross and Jonathan Lynn. A New Line release. Comedy. Rated PG-13 for some sexual content. Running time: 97 min.

"Lame" is the kindest adjective one can ascribe to helmer Jonathan Lynn's humorless comedy. Michael Richards (TV's "Seinfeld") stars as Richard, a well-intentioned, unemployed actor who, exhibiting many Kramer-esque mannerisms, pretends to be his best friend, lawyer Charlie (Jeff Daniels), who's out of commission after a bachelor party. Charlie has another problem: He falls in love with a new woman. Richards is irritating but ultimately reveals some humanity; as for Daniels, he's unwatchable.—Jean Oppenheimer

NATIONAL NEWS

NEW LINE SECURES FINANCING

It looks as though New Line has finally found a means of maintaining its independence from parent company Time Warner now that a Dutch bank, ABN-Amro, has committed to arrange a $400 million production loan financing deal for the film company. Sources say the loan is specifically a New Line deal, meaning it won't appear on Time Warner's balance sheet and the huge conglomerate won't be held liable for payment. Ever since Time Warner acquired New Line as a piece of the Turner Broadcasting buyout last year, it has been looking for a way to keep New Line separate. At first TW hoped to sell the company, but couldn't find a buyer at the right price. So it set about looking for ways to independently finance New Line, which currently produces about 15 films a year.

Insiders were surprised to see ABN move in as the lead bank on the deal and take it as a sign that the bank, which has previously had little presence in the entertainment industry, plans to be more aggressive in setting up film financing deals. Most expected Chase Securities, a big lender in the film industry and historically New Line's lender, to be the main bank on the arrangement, yet Chase is completely absent from the deal. ABN is now working on syndicating the loan with interested banks. The loan will reportedly have a life of four years.

Meanwhile, Chase may eventually be involved in a financing role. New Line still wants another financial facility to fund the purchase of New Line's completed pictures—a deal similar to what Fox, Universal and Polygram have in place. The second facility would be a bet on New Line's future performance. If the film performs, revenues from the pictures would repay the loan. ABN's facility is a straightforward, special purpose loan under which, once the films are completed, New Line is committed to buy back the pictures.

New Line has been reportedly made even more frustrated by owner Time Warner due to a deal it made with Time Warner entity Warner Bros. Reportedly, New Line "borrowed" director Barry Levinson to make a small, sharp-tongued political satire, "Wag the Dog," starring Dustin Hoffman and Robert De Niro. Part of the deal with WB said New Line couldn't release its movie until after WB released Levinsons' "Sphere." So, even though "Wag the Dog" is done and ready for release in September and the close to a $100 million "Sphere" (which also stars Hoffman, along with Sharon Stone and Samuel L. Jackson) won't be ready until Christmas, Warner Bros. is holding New Line to their contractual deal. So "Wag the Dog" is now scheduled for February '98 and New Line has yet another reason to want out from under the big Time Warner umbrella. And maybe Time Warner is afraid that, if New Line had its way, that would be considered a case of the tail actually wagging the dog.

SOUTHERN BAPTISTS JUST SAY NO TO DISNEY

After firing a warning shot a year ago, giving the Walt Disney Co. a year to respond to their objections, denomination leaders from the Southern Baptist Convention voted this past June to boycott all Walt Disney subsidiaries, including theatrical releases, the theme parks, toys and ABC television, for what it calls "anti-family, pro-gay" policies by the entertainment corporation. About 14,000 delegates participated in the annual meeting of the Southern Baptists, considered to be the nation's largest Protestant denomination with an estimated 15.7 million members.

Representatives from the convention said the boycott was in response to Disney's "gay-friendly" actions by allowing "Gay Days" at its theme parks organized by gay rights groups and extending health benefits to the partners of homosexual employees. The delegates also cited the "coming out" episode of ABC's "Ellen" as a reason for the boycott.

In response, some gay and lesbian organizations encouraged their members to show support for Disney by supporting Disney products. The company issued a written statement saying, "We are proud that the Disney brand creates more family entertainment of every kind than anyone else in the world. We plan to continue our leadership role and, in fact, we will increase production of family entertainment."

COOPER LANDS AT DREAMWORKS

Robert Cooper, who resigned as president of TriStar Pictures in May, has joined the Dreamworks SKG team as head of theatrical film development and production. Cooper will take over many responsibilities that film division co-heads Walter Parkes and Laurie MacDonald now shoulder. Cooper was head of HBO Pictures before former Sony Pictures Entertainment head Mark Canton brought him to TriStar last summer. After Canton exited SPE, Cooper and new SPE president and COO John Calley never saw eye to eye.

ALMOND EXITS LIVE

Paul Almond, executive vp production and acquisitions at Live Entertainment, left the company in May in what insiders say is the first response to the impending purchase of Live by Boston-based investment company Bain Capital Partners. Some inside Live attribute Almond's departure to differing approaches to production and acquisitions between Almond and Bain Capital. Rumors fly that more changes are coming from the independent company.

MORE MOVEMENT AT MGM

Robert E. Relyea has been promoted to president of production for MGM Pictures and United Artists. Relyea played a vital role in the successful rebuilding of the MGM and United Artists brand names and will continue to oversee all aspects of production from inception through post-production for both units. An industry veteran of over 40 years, Relyea served as executive vice president of production for MGM and UA since 1993. Prior to joining MGM, Relyea was senior vice president of production at Paramount Pictures.

SOUND LEADER SHUBERT BACK IN BUSINESS

Lynn Shubert, a popular past president of ITEA (International Technical Equipment Association) and past vice president of the Theatre Division of Christie Electronic Corp. has emerged from retirement to come on board as principal consultant for Los Angeles-based Miller & Kreisel Sound Corp. (M&K) in order to spearhead the company's launch of its new THX-approved line of monitors and powered subwoofers. Shubert, in addition to his stint at Christie, was instrumental in the discovery, development and introduction of numerous new theatre products. Some of his most successful products include the Christie projector and the ELF, the Endless-Loop Autowind.

SUMMER ADMISSIONS LOST WITHOUT "LOST WORLD"?

From the look of things in spring, insiders were saying the 1997 boxoffice was easily going to hit the $6 billion mark. This year marked the fastest climb in history when in May domestic boxoffice was running 17 percent ahead of last year. If it remains on pace, the numbers could surpass $6.2 billion by year's end due to a number of high-profile sequels and franchise movies and no pesky Olympics or presidential elections to slow down the summer movie fun. The "Star Wars" trilogy started it all and "The Lost World" cleaned up its opening weekend to the tune of $92.7 million, forecasting welcome bright days for the summer. But an ill wind began blowing even with "The Lost World" and "Con Air" topping the charts: overall boxoffice dropped 19 percent from last year's numbers in early June and continued to drop for weeks. When "Speed 2" opened to a disappointing $16.2 million, the summer seemed definitely in a slump. Executives are worried that even the huge $100 million blockbusters don't have the legs they used to have. Most films can count on making between only three and four times their opening weekend grosses. Of course, with the huge debut of "Batman and Robin" and the best opening for a romantic comedy ever with $21.5 million for "My Best Friend's Wedding," finally the summer started to heat up. Still it remains to be seen if the hot and cold running boxoffice based on very few, very expensive blockbusters will ultimately mean a healthy 1997 for exhibitors.

FOR THE LOVE OF DRIVE-INS

We at BOXOFFICE know from the response to the tribute to drive-in theatres that many BOXOFFICE readers love the drive-ins, so we thought that info on a quaint newsletter might be of interest to you. The premiere issue of "Drive-In Speaker" was published in May. Also known as DIS, the new and independent monthly newsletter is the official publication of the Drive-In Theatre Preservation Society, Inc. Featuring news, advertisements, theatre discounts and information on drive-ins past and present, the newsletter is of interest for anyone who operates a drive-in theatre or those who simply love them. EXHIBITION BRIEFINGS

CARMIKE STILL IN "FIRST" PLACE

In yet another major acquisition on the exhibition front, Carmike, the nation's largest circuit by screen count, will add even more to its tally with the purchase of 105 screens from First International Theatres. The First International sites being acquired are located in Kansas, Missouri, South Dakota, Arkansas and Nebraska. Columbus, Ga.-based Carmike will reportedly have a total of 2,695 screens upon the completion of this transaction.

It was also recently announced that Carmike plans to further expand through a joint venture with retailer Wal-Mart to develop entertainment centers anchored by second-run movie theatres. Under the 50-50 deal, Carmike will manage the entertainment centers while Wal-Mart will oversee the real estate and development aspects. The first of the entertainment centers will feature eight-screen theatres, skating rinks, arcades and restaurants, and will be located at former Wal-Mart sites that closed after Super Wal-Marts were opened nearby. The first center is scheduled to open this month in Goshen, Ind., followed by an opening this fall in Valparaiso, Ind., and a spring 1998 opening in Dekalb, Ill.

MARCUS ENTERS OHIO MARKET

Marcus Theatre Corp. has announced plans to build its first theatres in Ohio. The company will construct one 16-plex on the north side of the Columbus metropolitan area, and another 16-plex on the southeast side. "The Columbus area represents an exciting new growth market for Marcus Theatres," says Bruce J. Olson, president of Marcus. "We're confident that moviegoers in Ohio will respond just as enthusiastically to the unique Marcus experience as their counterparts have in Wisconsin and Illinois." The expansion into Ohio is part of Marcus' recently accelerated growth plan, in which the chain plans to have a total of 500 screens by the year 2000. The circuit currently operates 297 screens.

WEHRENBERG: LIFE'S A BEACH

Wehrenberg Theatres plans to build a 39,000-square-foot 10-plex in Osage Beach, Mo. The cinema will seat 1,800 and will feature top-of-the-line sound systems and plush stadium seating. Based in St. Louis, Wehrenberg operates theatres in Arizona, Illinois and Missouri.

PACIFIC'S LATEST FASHION

Due to open in the summer of 1998, Pacific Theatres' Northridge Fashion Center 10 will be a 2,800-seat state-of-the-art complex serving the residents of Northridge, Calif. Located in the Northridge Fashion Center Mall, the multiplex will feature DTS, SDDS and Dolby digital sound; stadium seating; loveseats with retractable armrests and cupholders, and large wall-to-wall screens.

LEAD STORY: LOEWS, CINEPLEX MAY MERGE

Regal Cinemas' acquisition of Cobb's 643 screens (see story, page 54) may not be the only mega-merger in the works. Sony Corp., parent company of Loews, the nation's ninth-largest circuit with 900 screens, is in talks with Cineplex Odeon, which ranks fifth in North America with 1,500 screens, to merge the two chains, with Sony taking the controlling interest in the combined company. A press release from Cineplex confirmed that negotiations are taking place, but warned that "no assurances can be given at this time that an agreement will be entered into with Sony, or if entered into that a transaction will be completed. Any transaction would be subject to a number of approvals, including shareholder and regulatory approvals in both Canada and the United States." Cineplex chooses its words with caution for good reason; two years ago, Cineplex was involved in a headline-making merger proposal with Cinemark USA, which would have formed the world's largest theatre company. But that deal fell apart when Cineplex's major shareholder, MCA Inc., was bought by Seagram Co.

If the venture does take place, the merged entity, at 2,400 screens, would rank as either the second or third largest circuit in the world, depending on United Artists' screen tally at the time (last reported to be 2,301, though new builds and divestitures could cause that figure to fluctuate significantly in the near future). Regal, whose screen count will increase to 2,076 after the completion of the Cobb purchase, would then be fourth. Carmike would still hang on to the top spot with 2,695 screens.

NATIONAL AMUSMENTS BUILDS IN BROOKLYN

National Amusements Inc. has announced plans to construct a 14-screen cinema in East Brooklyn—the first new cinema in the East New York neighborhood in decades, according to the circuit. The theatre will feature 3,200 custom-designed, deep-cushioned rocking recliner seats with cupholder armrests arranged in stadium-style seating; state-of-the-art projection and sound equipment; automated ticketing; and an 800-car parking lot. The refreshment center will offer standard and specialty food items freshly prepared moments before serving.

CINEMASTAR GETS $2M LOAN TO EXPAND CHAIN

CinemaStar Luxury Theaters Inc. announced it has reached an agreement with financing and concession services company Pacific Concessions Inc., under which PCI will loan the chain $2 million, which will go in part to a theatre expansion program. The loan was part of an agreement under which CinemaStar granted exclusive concession rights to all existing theatres to PCI. CinemaStar, founded in 1989, currently runs 64 screens in Southern California.

DTS PASSES 10,000 MARK

Digital Theater Systems announced that it has become the first digital sound provider to surpass the 10,000 mark in units shipped worldwide. DTS's position as the exclusive digital sound provider for "The Lost World: Jurassic Park" helped DTS post record number in April and May, shipping over 1,200 units in two months. That "The Lost World" was instrumental in setting this record is fitting, as DTS was launched with the release of the original "Jurassic Park" in 1993.

IMAX SPACES OUT WITH NASA

The Imax Corp. and the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA) have signed a deal under which Imax will produce a 3-D documentary on the construction of the international space station, which begins in 1998 and is scheduled for completion in 2002. The U.S., Russia, Canada and several European nations are participating in the space station project. Astronauts will shoot the documentary using Imax's large-format film. Upon its release, the film will be shown exclusively at Imax theatres, which currently number approximately 153 worldwide.

Mike Campbell Discusses the Acquisition That Will Rocket Regal Up the Ranks of Exhibition

by Christine James

Mike Campbell gave up his career as manager of a regional grocery store chain in 1982 to pursue the possibilities exhibition had to offer. Within five years of building up his first circuit, Premiere Cinemas, he accepted an offer from Cinemark and sold the chain. But by then, exhibition was in his blood, and he founded Knoxville, Tenn.-based Regal Cinemas in 1989, taking on the position of president and CEO. Under his leadership, a mere eight years later, Regal is among the top-ranked circuits in the nation. And following the impending $200 million acquisition of Cobb Theatres and its 643 screens in Alabama, Arkansas, Florida and Mississippi (with 83 additional screens in the works in South Carolina, Florida and Tennessee), Regal will leap forward to likely become the third largest chain in North America by the end of this year, with 2,076 screens in operation (and 900 more under construction). Shortly after the Cobb announcement, Campbell spoke with* Boxoffice *about his formula for success.

Boxoffice: What made Cobb a good fit for Regal?

MIKE CAMPBELL: Actually, it fits like a glove. Number one, it's Southeastern-based, with heavy concentrations in Alabama and Florida. And in fact, I think Cobb is the number one exhibitor in Florida as far as number of screens, and when you combine that with what we have in Florida as Regal, we have a tremendous market share in Florida, which is a very high-growth state. In addition, Cobb has quality properties. They average currently about 9.6 screens per location, which is, as far as I know, one of the highest in the industry. So I think we have good long-term assets that we're acquiring in attractive markets.

Boxoffice: What about the design of Cobb's theatres?

CAMPBELL: The quality of the properties is very good, and we're particularly impressed with what they've done with recent construction. They've built some very impressive complexes in Florida and Alabama recently.

Boxoffice: Will some of the Cobb executives and employees stay on with Regal?

CAMPBELL: As in any acquisition, I think you're going to realize some efficiencies when you consolidate. Historically, we have retained certain members of acquired companies. At this point it's too early in the process to make a full determination, but I'm sure we will be retaining some of their corporate people.

Boxoffice: Will the Cobb name be retired?

CAMPBELL: I think there is value in the Cobb name; it's a very well-respected trademark. But I think over time, it will be converted to the Regal logo, probably within six months to a year.

Boxoffice: Do you plan to go forth with building plans Cobb may have had?

CAMPBELL: We plan on going forward with everything that they have in the development pipeline. It complements our building program and doesn't compete or conflict with it in any location, so that's another plus to us doing this deal.

Boxoffice: Regal has obtained a lot of its screens through mergers and acquisitions. Do you know about what the percentage would be, as opposed to building?

CAMPBELL: With the Cobb acquisition, I'm just guessing that by the end of '97, once we've opened several more of our new screens that are under construction, we're going to still be comprised probably of two-thirds acquired properties and one-third properties that we have built.

Boxoffice: Why do you prefer to buy out existing theatres rather than build new ones to your standards?

CAMPBELL: I think it boils down to just executing our overall growth plan. And Cobb's complexes and their market strategy are very, very similar to Regal's. They have a fairly new screen base; their properties are modern. And we've also been able to use our stock again in this transaction as a currency, which makes it an attractive deal not only for Regal, but also I think it's attractive to members of the Cobb family, who have the potential of getting additional upside as this company grows.

Boxoffice: Has this acquisition affected Regal's previously announced building plans in any way?

CAMPBELL: It doesn't have any impact on that. We're going forward with everything that we've announced.

Boxoffice: Which other chains have you acquired in the past few years?

CAMPBELL: Just a few months ago, we acquired Magic Cinemas in New Jersey. Last year we acquired Krikorian Premiere Theatres in Southern California, as well as Georgia State Theatres, which was more commonly known as Storey Theatres, in Georgia. Prior to that, we acquired the Litchfield Theatre chain, or I would say maybe the Litchfield II chain, which was the successor company to the Litchfield chain that was sold to United Artists back in the '80s. We acquired National Theatre Corp. in Northern Ohio and NEI [Neighborhood Entertainment Inc.] in Virginia. And most of the other acquisitions that we've done have been really just small piecemeal acquisitions that probably wouldn't be a significant factor in the total screen count.

Boxoffice: Size-wise, Regal's probably going to clock in at about number three with this new acquisition.

CAMPBELL: That's probably correct.

Boxoffice: Do you envision that Regal will take the crown in the next few years and become number one?

CAMPBELL: We've really never focused on being number one, or who's number one. I think our strategy is to continue to grow this company as efficiently and profitably as we can. We don't really have any regard to being number one. If it happens, it happens. But that's not really a goal. We're proud of what we've accomplished, but we're careful not to let the thought of being number one or the thought of being the biggest chain influence our decisions. I think we try to keep those type of things in check, because in my opinion, when that becomes your primary goal, that's when ego kicks in to the decision-making process, and we really don't want ego to play a factor here. We want it to be business judgment only.

Boxoffice: What is your overall philosophy about the business?

CAMPBELL: I think it's a business that's undergoing tremendous change now, not only through technology, but through consolidation. It's a business that has to be constantly aware of technologies that are competing for the entertainment dollar. But at the same time, I think the future of this industry, at least the exhibition end of the industry, can be very bright, as long as we don't over-build, and kill the goose that laid the golden egg. I think in some cases, there is going to be overbuilding in certain markets, and I'm not sure what the ultimate impact of that will be. But that's one of the concerns that we do have.

BOXOFFICE: Do you have any international building plans?

CAMPBELL: At this point in time, we don't have any international plans. We're not terribly inclined to go out and start developing theatres from the ground up in markets and territories that we don't understand and that are dramatically different from the domestic market. However, if we ever found the right partner or the right acquisition opportunity internationally, I wouldn't rule it out. It's not something that's currently in the works.

BOXOFFICE: What makes a Regal theatre a Regal theatre?

CAMPBELL: It begins with the personnel, starting at corporate and flowing down through the theatres. I think we try to instill a sense of pride and a sense of customer service in those employees. And we do feel like we execute fairly well in that respect. What makes a Regal theatre a Regal theatre? The look is obviously a factor. We have a distinctive look. Typically, what we're building today is focusing on an art deco look, something that takes the moviegoer back to maybe the '30s and '40s look. A lot of neon. A lot of art deco colors in the color scheme. Many of our theatres include cafes, specialty concessions. Some units are continuing to be built that include our new FunScape entertainment unit. The amenities that we're putting in these new theatres are state-of-the-art.

BOXOFFICE: What do you think Regal provides to the average moviegoer?

CAMPBELL: We bring a quality building, we bring good customer service, convenient location and a variety of films. It's rewarding to be able to bring this to a lot of communities that really haven't had this type of operation historically. It's gratifying to go to grand openings and see the consumers come in and go "Wow!"

BOXOFFICE: What would you say is the most exciting thing happening in the exhibition and film industries today?

CAMPBELL: We're certainly excited about the magnitude and the quality of new theatres that are opening. We hope to continue being a part of that phenomenon. To me, on the exhibition end, that's the major force today. I think on the studio end and the distribution end, we're certainly excited about the studios continuing to produce quality films. At least the sense that I have is that exhibition is becoming much more a year-round business as opposed to being so seasonal.

BOXOFFICE: What do you enjoy most about being the head of Regal?

CAMPBELL: Coming to work every day. Other than that, I really enjoy being able to share the success of this company with our employees and not just a handful of key executives. All of our corporate employees are equity partners in this company. We have distributed stock and stock options throughout our corporate structure. And it gives me a lot of satisfaction to have been able to do that with a publicly-traded company that has been successful.

BOXOFFICE: You seem very calm about your rapid ascension in the ranks of exhibition.

CAMPBELL: Well, I mean, we just stick to business. We just make sure we go on with business and try to be the best company that we can be.

NORTHERN EXPOSURE

Canadian News Notes by Shlomo Schwartzberg

Along with fellow Torontonian David Cronenberg, 36-year-old Atom Egoyan is one of Canada's best-known directors—and a towering figure in the world of independent filmmaking. His films, including "The Adjuster" and "Exotica," have garnered him a reputation as the purveyor of quirky, compelling films about sexual obsession and ennui. Now, Egoyan's newest film, "The Sweet Hereafter," his first adapted screenplay (from Russell Banks' book about the ramifications of a calamitous bus crash on a small community), has won the eccentric indie new accolades, having received the Cannes Film Festival's prestigious Grand Prix—the highest honor Cannes has yet bestowed on a Canadian film. "The Sweet Hereafter" (which has been picked up by Fine Line for U.S. distribution) was Egoyan's fourth Cannes entry: "Exotica," which went on to gross $5 million in the States, also played in competition and won a critics' prize, and "The Adjuster" and "Speaking Parts" both played the Director's Fortnight. Egoyan spoke to BOXOFFICE about his new film and other aspects of his unique career, including a brief flirtation with Hollywood that didn't come to fruition.

"It saddens me that there are emerging filmmakers who won't have the freedom to experiment that I had."

BOXOFFICE: Does "The Sweet Hereafter" follow in the vein of your other films, or is it very different?

ATOM EGOYAN: It falls in the vein of the other films structurally very much so. The film is not linear. However, because the central event pictured in the film is so dramatic, it has a different emotional effect. And also it's about a community, and the other films have really been about individuals searching for identity. There's a sense of detail—the characters all know themselves—and in the other films the people didn't really know themselves. Even though the characters are experiencing extreme pain and anguish and confusion, they're all self aware. That's quite a major departure from the other films. They're not as numbed emotionally and spiritually as the characters in my previous films.

BOXOFFICE: Could you have made a film like this earlier in your career?

EGOYAN: I wouldn't have approached this material. It's really searing emotionally and I couldn't have dealt with it a few years ago. What's interesting about it is it might seem simpler than the other films but there's like 30 different time periods in the film itself. So it's infinitely more complex than anything I've ever done, but it doesn't seem that way because you always know where you are emotionally.

BOXOFFICE: Does being in Cannes help you crack markets you haven't yet penetrated?

EGOYAN: Weirdly enough, I can say that [thanks largely to a presence at Cannes] the film has basically been pre-sold everywhere. A lot of these markets were sold on the basis of this film having gotten into competition [even prior to the Grand Prix win]. It's a huge feather in the cap. It has an immeasurable effect.

BOXOFFICE: You have the reputation, certainly in Europe and at home in Canada, as one of world cinema's most significant filmmakers. How does that strike you?

EGOYAN: I can say that I'm genuinely humbled by that, because I understand how that's happened, and yet for me, I think that there are a lot of films ahead of me, and I'm really grateful that the films I have made have been able to enjoy a certain status.

BOXOFFICE: How do you feel about the recent film funding cutbacks in Canada, especially in your home province of Ontario?

EGOYAN: We're in a perverse situation where there's a tremendous amount of money floating around, and yet it's not really for feature films. There seems to be a lot of money for TV movies and for TV series, and I think it's strange that feature films have been somewhat marginalized in the process because, ultimately, those are our most visible cultural export. There's a climate that I was definitely a product of, in Ontario, in the mid- to late-'80s, with the Ontario Film Development Corporation. That was a very heady time—there was a lot of support [for filmmakers], and I wouldn't have had the career I've had without that support. So it saddens me that there are emerging filmmakers who won't have the freedom to experiment that I had. But I continue to be really involved in supporting first features. There are three first features that I'm executive producing. I think it's really important to do that.

BOXOFFICE: What happened to the Warner Bros. film, "Dead Sleep," that you were supposed to direct in Hollywood?

EGOYAN: The film was about a female lawyer who deals with right-to-die cases, who falls in love with a doctor whose wife is in a coma. She's in the strange position of falling in love with the man whose wife she's effectively killing. My involvement was based on limited and narrow choices to cast. I wanted Susan Sarandon to play that role, and for the longest time they didn't want her. And by the time they wanted her [after her Oscar win for "Dead Man Walking"], it was too late. If we had approached her when I wanted to, there's sufficient evidence that she would have [done the part]. She really liked "Exotica" and she liked the script. By the time we finally got around to meeting her, I think the last thing she would have accepted to do was a thriller, because her career was in a different place.

Making a film is all about controlling your casting, because if you have a good relationship with your star, it's the star who has the power. It was very important to me to have an actress I was really excited about working with.

BOXOFFICE: What did that experience teach you about working in Hollywood?

EGOYAN: I'm getting lots of scripts, but I'm just more cautious after that experience. I know the playing field much more now. I know that a Hollywood project is either going to get made quite quickly or it's going to hang around for awhile, and I'm not one of those people who can just hang around L.A. I need to make things.

INTERNATIONAL NEWS BRIEFS

EUROVIEWS

LEAD STORY: BRITISH REVOLUTION

LONDON—The Arts Council of England (ACE) announced May 15 three film consortiums that will receive a hefty $149 million, which is expected to revolutionize British filmmaking. The award, to be split among the recipients, will create what are in effect mini-studios, and is intended to make the United Kingdom a more powerful international filmmaking force. The consortiums, formed expressly for the ACE competition, contain the major elements necessary to realize a film, including producers, directors, distributors, sales agents and exhibitors. The winners are: The Film Consortium, made up of four production companies, the Virgin Cinemas chain, and Carlton Film Distributors; Pathe Pictures, with financial backing from non-British European banks; and DNA Films, made up of "Trainspotting" director Andrew Macdonald and "Four Weddings and a Funeral" producer Duncan Kenworthy.

The three groups beat out 34 other applicants, including such competition as Partners in Film (made up of, among others, Merchant Ivory Productions, major U.K. distributor First Independent, Elton John's Rocket Pictures, and EMI Music Publishing) and Penzance Films (including directors Nicolas Roeg and Ken Russell). One applicant estimated that being awarded a franchise could allow him to spend $10 million per film, one-third above the British average. British film industry personnel hope the studio franchises will bolster U.K. distribution, regarded as a weak link in the industry chain. DNA's future films will be distributed regionally by PolyGram, while CiBy Sales recently announced international sales rights.

Deals with U.S. distributors for any of the three franchises have yet to be made. The total amount awarded to the three franchises was actually less than the initial $253 million originally earmarked for the venture. The remainder of the money may be used to fund projects by nonfranchisees.

LABOUR: THE MOVIE

LONDON—The Labour Party's victory in Britain's May elections have boosted the British film industry, already invigorated by the studio-franchise awards (see above). Labour leader Tony Blair, the new prime minister, had promised during the election campaign that the U.K. would rejoin Eurimages, Europe's co-production and distribution funding body—although, post-election, he is noncommittal about when. The new government also appointed Britain's first film minister, Tom Clarke, a signal that the incoming government intends to take the business and cultural aspects of the film industry seriously. The new culture secretary, Chris Smith, announced a policy plan for the film industry, including doubling the number of British films on U.K. screens (from their current 10 percent market share), although he did not say how. Other goals of the seven-point plan include wooing older audience members to the cinema, improving exports, and developing technical skills within the industry by working with the government's education department. Meanwhile, the country of "Trainspotting" is having its own mini-revival, with a new country-wide booster agency Scottish Screen and the launch of the Glasgow Film Fund.

CZECH STUDIO POWER PLAY, TAKE TWO

PRAGUE—Barrandov studio head Vaclav Marhoul (BOXOFFICE EuroViews Q&A, Nov. 1996) was fired in May by the company's majority shareholder, the Moravia Steel company, to make room for one of its own directors, Pavel Prerovsky. The firing immediately prompted an outcry from the Czech film community. The Oscar-winning director of "Kolya," Jan Sverak, said the loss of Marhoul's visionary direction would hurt Czech film. Milos Forman ("The People Vs. Larry Flynt"), the honorary chairman of the studio's board, said a steel company shouldn't run a movie studio. Marhoul is credited with effecting Barrandov's transformation from a communist-era, state-run institution to a private enterprise. It was deja vu for Marhoul, who had been fired before by the former board of directors only to arrange a secret takeover of the company that put him back on top. Meanwhile, the Czech Ministry of Culture, which holds a "golden share" giving it the power to veto any nonfilm-related uses of the studio, is investigating Moravia Steel's mortgage of Barrandov property to secure a major loan for one of its steel subsidiaries.

PRIX FIXE MENU

NANTES—The presence of three rival multiplexes in the French city of Nantes provides one vision of a future when Europe reaches screen saturation: higher rates of movie-going, but at the cost of discounted tickets and unhappy distributors. France's three giants UGC, Gaumont and Pathe have been locked in a battle for filmgoers since each opened multiplexes in Nantes recently. Overall, cinema attendance in the city increased 47 percent but declined at individual theatres. To jump-start falling ticket sales, the UGC Apollo cinema (a seven-screen theatre that existed before the three multis arrived) in January began offering discounted ticket prices ($1.70 instead of $7.20) for second-run films, which it promoted according to themes, including cult films, love stories and auteur works. The strategy worked: Attendance jumped to 15,000 tickets sold per week from 2,000. That represents a boxoffice take of $27,000, up from $10,200 since the arrival of the three giants. In March, the Pathe-run multiplex followed suit, cutting its ticket prices to $4.30 and sparking fears among distributors that their percentage of the boxoffice would diminish. Several distributors, including the French independents Bac Films and MK2, threatened to yank their product. As a result, Pathe returned its prices to the normal level. Gaumont stayed out of the fracas, keeping its tickets at the standard $6.80. A Gaumont representative said he feared the discounts could lead patrons to regard normal ticket prices as too high.

Compiled by BOXOFFICE MAGAZINE. Numbers for Boxoffice Gross represent total domestic boxoffice grosses to the nearest $100,000; + signs indicate that films remain in theatrical release. Number of Screens indicates the maximum number of screens in widest, simultaneous release. Entries in the Theatrical/Video Distributor column list two names when the video releasing company is different from (or releases through a subsidiary different from) the theatrical distributor. Exact day-and-date specific entries for Home Video Release are confirmed; in all other cases, the month indicated for a release is forecast by the editors of BOXOFFICE. BOXOFFICE is not liable for errors or omissions in the chart.

The Big Picture

From Mel Gibson and Peter Weir to "Muriel's Wedding" and "Priscilla, Queen of the Desert," the impact of modern Australian cinema has been incalculable. The '80s "Australian New Wave" established a range of international luminaries, including Weir, Gibson, Bruce Beresford and Phillip Noyce. When that seminal talent pool relocated to Hollywood, Australia continued to stay in the vanguard of international production as home to such second-generation talents as Russell Crowe and Nicole Kidman, and by the creation of works as varied as the "Crocodile Dundee" features, "Young Einstein" and edgy, controversial fare like 1992's "Romper Stomper." When it comes to contemporary cinema, Australian production takes a back seat to no one.

There was a time, though, some 60 years ago, when Australian production was comparatively undeveloped, and when the international barriers to the export of Australian product were almost insurmountable. In that era, one unlikely rogue became the epitome of Australian charm and manliness: an actor named Errol Flynn.

Flynn's wayward life began on June 20, 1909, when the actor was born in Hobart, Tasmania, the son of Mrs. Marelle Young Flynn and a well-travelled Irish marine biologist named Theodore Thomson. Flynn inherited his father's wanderlust from a very early age; educated in Paris, London and Sydney, his school record was distinguished by young Errol's habit of running away when the mood took him. His first "adult" job was as second cook on a schooner, followed in rapid succession by a brief career in politics, a stint as the overseer of a copra plantation, and a slightly more successful period as a newspaper correspondent in Sydney.

But Flynn was too restless to stay put for long, and by the early 1930s, he was operating his own chartered schooner off the coast of New Guinea. One day, some Americans bearing esoteric motion picture gear asked him to help them scout locations for a documentary on local headhunters. Flynn's almost unbelievably photogenic appearance caught the filmmakers' fancy, and they shot a great deal of footage of their unknown skipper—images shown throughout Australia which marked Flynn's screen debut.

Flynn relocated to England to study acting, where a Warner Bros. talent scout spotted him in 1935, and from there Flynn's ascension to superstardom was a steep one. The silent stars were on their way out, and the pioneering moguls were looking for newcomers to replace such "names" of the '20s as Douglas Fairbanks and John Barrymore. Warner decided to position its new contract player as a combination of both Fairbanks and Barrymore in a swashbuckling adventure film so suited to his appeal that it became and remains a screen classic: 1935's "Captain Blood."

Flynn was quickly cast in some of the greatest adventure films of all time, including "The Charge of the Light Brigade," "The Sea Hawk," and a movie that amounted to typecasting, "The Adventures of Don Juan." The pinnacle of Flynn's career came with 1938's "The Adventures of Robin Hood"—a beautifully mounted, brilliantly directed and perfectly cast action film that managed to deliver the goods as both high adventure and high romance.

Flynn's visible glamor blinded many observers to his very real acting ability. The immediate source of his appeal was obvious; there may never have been a more dashing screen figure, and Warner, with its mania for easily marketable formula, rarely allowed Flynn to deviate from the action-packed mode. But Flynn's devil-may-care attitude and his impatience with what he felt was the exaggerated histrionics of co-stars like Bette Davis manifested itself in an understated naturalism that seems strikingly modern today. Almost two decades before the popularization of the "Method," Flynn instinctively knew what it took Marlon Brando a hundred acting lessons to discover: that sometimes, for the truest performance, it isn't so much necessary to do as it is to be.

Flynn's outrageous offscreen escapades made him one of the most infamous hedonists in an industry with a lot of competition for the title. His sexual conquests may have numbered in the hundreds, and he even stood trial for statutory rape in 1942 in a headline-grabbing circus that might have destroyed a star with a different kind of persona. Flynn was acquitted when one of the ladies in question admitted that she "didn't have no objections" when Flynn made a pass at her, and a new phrase entered American slang: for males of the '40s and '50s, it became common practice to describe good fortune (especially with women) as being "in like Flynn."

Flynn also had an inordinate fondness for alcohol, which led to increasingly erratic behavior as the '40s progressed and the gradual ravaging of that famous face. He was 50 when he died, but he looked 70, and his last years were marked by professional inactivity and a financial situation so desperate he was actually in Vancouver selling off his beloved yacht, the Zaca, when a heart attack claimed him.

Along with unproven rumors that he was everything from a drug addict to a Nazi spy, Flynn left behind one of the most purely enjoyable screen legacies of any action star. To generations, he remains one of the reigning icons of manliness—tough but tender, fairminded but capable of righteous anger, a man's man who often managed to look more beautiful onscreen than the ladies who starred opposite him. As one of Australia's first great emissaries to moviehouses all over the world, Flynn carried with him the mantle of a country both rugged and proud, embodying the best of that inheritance in terms anyone with eyes and ears could understand. It's a legacy that continues to last, of which his countrymen can be justifiably proud.—Ray Greene

CHRISTIE QUALITY CONTROL

The Christie Quality Control symbol is your assurance of superior design, manufacturing and reliability.

Buying a projector or film handling system doesn't guarantee it will perform perfectly the first time you flip the switch. Unless, of course, it's a Christie. Because every Christie component and system must meet the most stringent quality control standards in the industry—from design to manufacturing to assembly.

And before any unit leaves our door, it is thoroughly tested to ensure that it will perform the first time, and every time, day in and day out. Our quality control goals are "zero defects" and "100% reliability".

Whether it's testing performance parameters on projectors or calibrations on optics, we know how critical it is to have your projection equipment arrive trouble free. It's a commitment that involves every one of our employees, and it's the reason Christie projection equipment is the best in the business.

LETTERS

Last weekend I went to my local theatre to see "Con Air." As the movie started, I noticed that the picture went off the sides of the screen. You guessed it. The movie was in Scope and the screen was wall-to-wall 1.85:1 Flat.

I asked the manager and he played dumb at first, then told me it was a Scope picture on a Flat screen. He said most people don't notice and don't know any better, told me not to tell anyone, and then gave me a free pass.

This is a rip-off! The theatre in question is a 10-plex. Only two of the 10 screens can show a Scope movie—the rest are cropped. And they are preparing to build more of the same design!

Who can be contacted in the industry to put this problem right? I hope you care about this as I do, and can do something about it.

Thanks,

Bob Meza

Valencia, Calif.

Thank YOU, Bob. We do care about this far too common problem, which is why we've run your letter at the top of this section. We hope you don't mind that we've removed the name of the circuit you mentioned to avoid causing needless embarassment for it in print. Our hunch is that your letter will suffice to remind them of your complaint. As to who to contact in order to deal with this problem: in our view, you already came to the right place!

The projection article in the April '97 issue of BOXOFFICE was a benefit for all projectionists. "Projection's Seven Deadly Sins" by Sean Lohan is like a pocket manual that all projectionists should have hanging in the projection room. Mr. Lohan listed so many of the important "don'ts"—most notably using shoe polish on prints to distinguish splices! I myself was once told that it was the best way to mark splices; I'm glad to find written proof of my theory about it ruining film!

If possible, can you please publish info on the National Film Service, headed by Mr. Lohan? I am trying to learn all I can about being a projectionist, as I would like to own and operate my own theatre some day.

Thanks, and keep up the good work!

Philip Herman

Rockaway Beach, N.Y.

You'll find a listing for National Film Service on page 93 in the ALLIED portion of this issue's Buyers Directory.

I was just doing some thinking. Print as many of the following comments as you wish:

—Re: "The Movie Palace Guard" (4/97): Not a bad piece in the April '97 issue, but you missed at least one Hollywood palace: the Pacific on Hollywood Boulevard between Wilcox and Cahuenga. It's been closed in recent years but will hopefully be re-opened in mid-'98 by Tyrone Power's granddaughter...

—Probably the main reason for the closing of many of the Hollywood single screens was the opening of the GCC Galaxy multiplex on Hollywood Boulevard in the early '90s...

—Still waiting for the concessions revolution to hit L.A. Yeah, we've got bottled water, nachos, $2 bon-bons and ice cream bars, smaller pre-packaged hot dogs and high prices. But where are the branded goodies you mentioned in "Appetite for Construction" (4/97)?

—When is the IMAX and Iwerks theatre revolution going to come?

—Hollywood creativity still seems to be directed at the making of movies rather than the showing of movies. Witness all the shoebox screens with identical starting times, ensuring long lines at the boxoffice to accompany the high prices at the concession stand...

—How about bringing back the double feature with newsreels and cartoons instead of a half-hour of previews? Also bring back the drive-in (a great site in Hollywood would be the deserted TAV building between Selma and Sunset)...

—How about earlier starting times (7 to 9 a.m.) on Christmas? And why not have bargain prices the whole day?

PS: All in all, yours is a good magazine, except when you don't tell all sides of the story. Don't your arms get tired from patting yourselves on the back?

Gerald Janke

Hollywood, Calif.

Re: Our tired arms: They do, which is why we'll let that comment stand.

BOXOFFICE BUYERS DIRECTORY QUESTIONNAIRE

GREETINGS, LOYAL READER!

Yes, another year has gone by. How do you know? Because you are about to read your copy of the 1998 BOXOFFICE MAGAZINE BUYERS DIRECTORY, the most complete reference information source of its kind in the motion picture business!

Like literally THOUSANDS of industry professionals, you rely on the BOXOFFICE BUYERS DIRECTORY to do business. As in years past, you're downright delighted to receive your copy! Only one thing could increase your sense of joy and anticipation as you page through the B.O. B.D.:

If your company and roster were listed.

It's all right. Fess up. Despite receiving our form in the mail and then by fax, you didn't send us your corporate roster and a description of your product. Maybe you were too distraught over the underperformance of so many big-budget films this past summer, or too excited by the impending launch of two film distributors, DreamWorks SKG and Polygram, to think about taking FIVE MINUTES to reach THOUSANDS OF POTENTIAL CUSTOMERS at ABSOLUTELY NO COST TO YOU! Or maybe this ad represents the first time you ever realized you too could be included in the BOXOFFICE BUYERS DIRECTORY, in which case you might be suffering from that malaise called NGS—nonrespondents guilt syndrome.

So, right up front in this issue, we thought we'd provide you with the best cure possible: a response form for next year's BUYERS DIRECTORY. If you missed your chance to appear in these pages, or wound up in the Nonrespondents penalty pokey, here's your answer. If your competition is listed here, may we recommend a rapid response? And, if your competition isn't listed here, may we point out an unprecedented, risk-free opportunity for you to gain an edge?

DON'T BE A SCHLEMIEL! Take a minute! RESPOND! That way, if you liked this year's BOXOFFICE BUYERS DIRECTORY, we guarantee you'll just LOVE next year's!

HOLLYWOOD UPDATES

Disney is "Barry" busy making production deals: the studio has signed a three-year pact with director Barry Sonnenfeld (helmer of "Men in Black") and Barry Josephson (former president of worldwide production for Columbia Pictures), who first worked together on "Men in Black" and have joined forces to become a producing team.

Miramax recently paid a first-time filmmaker with the oddest currency, "bar" none. Bartender Troy Duffy not only earned a six-figure payday for his screenplay "The Boondock Saints," but he also got the studio to buy him J. Sloan's, a bar where he once worked and still frequents. Under the deal, Duffy will make his directorial debut, and his band, The Brood, will provide the soundtrack.

Polygram Filmed Entertainment has inked director Alan Parker ("Evita") and his production company, Dirty Hands Prods., to a first-look deal, under which Parker will write, produce and/or direct. Polygram plans to finance and distribute one or two Dirty Hands productions per year.

Jonathan Frakes, who helmed and starred in "Star Trek: First Contact," has entered a two-year, first-look agreement with Paramount, under which he will develop and direct films. "I'm thrilled with Paramount's vote of confidence in me, and am proud to be staying with the studio I've called home for the past decade," says Frakes.

Writer-director Jonathan Mostow ("Breakdown") has signed a first-look deal with Universal to direct and produce features. The first film under the deal may be a historical drama he's co-scripting with John Bishop. He's also teaming with Jon Favreau (writer/star of "Swingers") on a project called "Leatherheads," about the formation of the National Football League.

Actress Julia Ormond ("Smilla's Sense of Snow") and her production company, Indican Prods., have signed a two-year, first-look agreement with Fox Searchlight Pictures. Ormond will produce, direct and write projects for Searchlight, which is 20th Century Fox's art-house division. The first project under the deal is "Telling Lies," about an FBI polygraph expert accused of falsifying a test for the mob. The second may be an adaptation of Isak Dinesen's short story "The Dreaming Child."

Football star Howie Long, who made his screen debut last year in John Woo's "Broken Arrow," has signed a three-picture deal with Morgan Creek Prods. The agreement will 'kick off' with "Field Test," an action drama about a military test field. Long still has two films left in his three-picture pact with Fox; the first film under that arrangement is the upcoming actioner "Firestorm."

"Contact" director Robert Zemeckis, former CAA co-chairman Jack Rapke and "Forrest Gump" producer Steve Starkey have formed a company called Image Movers and have signed a five-year deal with DreamWorks. DreamWorks will finance Image Movers films, release them theatrically and pay for the company's overhead.

The Independent Feature Project will honor Kevin Kline at the 1997 IFP Gotham Awards, to be held Sept. 16 at New York City's Manhattan Center. The Gotham Awards recognize individuals who have been successful in New York and have demonstrated an outstanding commitment to independent filmmaking. Kline, whose credits include "Fierce Creatures," "A Fish Called Wanda," "Sophie's Choice" and "The Big Chill," as well as the upcoming Ang Lee film "The Ice Storm" and the Frank Oz-helmed "In and Out," will receive the actor award. Previous recipients include Christopher Walken, Sigourney Weaver, Harvey Keitel, Susan Sarandon and John Turturro. Also honored will be Ruth Prawer Jhabvala as the winner of this year's writer award. Jhabvala is an Academy Award-winning scribe who has collaborated with Merchant Ivory Productions on such films as "A Room With a View," "Howards End" and "Remains of the Day," among others.

ON THE MOVE: Ann Daly, former head of Walt Disney Home Video, has been appointed to head up DreamWorks' feature animation division...Jerry Ketcham, formerly executive production manager for The Walt Disney Motion Pictures Group, has been promoted to VP of motion picture production for the studio. He's currently in charge of such projects as "Flubber," "Mr. Magoo" and "My Favorite Martian"...Michelle Manning has been named president of production of Paramount's Motion Picture Group, overseeing all aspects of the development and production of the studio's motion pictures. Manning joined Paramount in 1991 as senior VP of production, and was promoted to executive VP of production in 1993..Also at Paramount, Blaise Noto has been upped from senior VP to executive VP, while western division VP Clark Woods has been promoted to senior VP, assistant general sales manager for the domestic distribution division...Allison Brecker will join Universal Pictures as senior VP of production...William A. Jones has been appointed to the post of senior executive VP of MGM. He's been with the company 14 years, most recently as executive VP of corporate affairs.

BITS AND PIECES: Def Pictures, whose "How to Be a Player" comes out this month, has renewed its first-look agreement with Polygram Filmed Entertainment for another three years...Vondie Curtis Hall, writer and director of "Gridlock'd," has signed a first-look deal under which he'll write, direct and produce films for both Fox 2000 and Fox Searchlight...Burst Bubble: Universal and Sid Sheinberg's Bubble Factory have ended their alliance. The Bubble Factory, which was fully financed by Universal, produced such tepid performers as "Flipper," "McHale's Navy" "That Old Feeling" and "A Simple Wish" under the pact.

HOLLYWOOD REPORT

MIKE MYERS

"Me" Generation

HUGH GRANT

Always Well-"Groomed"

CHRISTINA RICCI

Attracted To "Opposite"

"JUST LIKE ME" An egomaniacal womanizer fantasizes about meeting a lady just like himself—and his wish comes true. Mike Myers ("Austin Powers: International Man of Mystery") will play a dual role as male and female versions of the same person. (New Line)

"ARKANSAS" Brad Pitt ("The Devil's Own") will star in this turn-of-the-century drama about a cold-hearted sharecropper who imports 25 orphans to work his land. Billy Bob Thornton ("Sling Blade") is in talks to direct. (DreamWorks)

"THE RELUCTANT GROOM" Hugh Grant, who became famous for playing a reluctant groom in his breakout hit "Four Weddings and a Funeral," will play another hesitant hubby in this romantic comedy. Grant will play a man who is wary of commitment, yet he marries a woman who happens to feel the same way. Later, they discover their marriage was not legitimate, and must decide whether they should stay together or break up. (Universal)

"OWD BOB" Colm Meaney ("Con Air") and James Cromwell ("Star Trek: First Contact") will star in this drama about a young American boy who goes to live with his British grandfather after his parents are killed. Rodney Gibbons ("The Neighbor") directs. (Distribution is to be set)

"EYE OF THE BEHOLDER" Ewan McGregor ("Trainspotting") will play a private eye tailing a woman who turns out to be a serial killer in this black comedy-thriller, to be directed by "The Adventures of Priscilla, Queen of the Desert's" Stephan Elliott. (Distribution is to be set)

"HOLY MAN" Eddie Murphy ("The Nutty Professor") will star for director Stephen Herek ("101 Dalmatians") in this comedy about a greedy program director of a home shopping TV show who tries to boost sales by putting a guru on the air. (Buena Vista)

"THE PATRIOT" Steven Seagal continues to bring environmental messages to moviegoers while kicking bad guy ass, as seen in "On Deadly Ground" and the upcoming "Fire Down Below." This time, he must save millions from a biochemical terrorism threat instigated by a fanatical militia group. (Distribution is to be set)

"THE THIN RED LINE" Director Terrence Malick ("Badlands") has assembled an all-star cast including Woody Harrelson ("The People vs. Larry Flynt"), Sean Penn ("She's So Lovely"), John Travolta ("Face/Off"), Nick Nolte ("Mother Night"), George Clooney ("Batman & Robin"), John Cusack ("Grosse Pointe Blank"), Bill Pullman ("Lost Highway") and Ben Chaplin ("The Truth About Cats and Dogs") for this drama, which is based on James Jones' autobiographical novel about his experiences in the battle of Guadalcanal in 1942. Adrien Brody ("The Last Time I Committed Suicide") will portray Corporal Fife, the character based on Jones. (Fox)

"THE LEGEND OF THE PIANIST ON THE OCEAN" Tim Roth ("Hoodlum") will star for director Giuseppe Tornatore in this story about a gifted pianist's career aboard a cruise ship. Legendary composer Ennio Morricone ("The Good, the Bad, and the Ugly") will write the musical score. (Distribution is to be set)

"THE ICE QUEEN" Sydney Pollack ("Sabrina") will direct this drama, which will star Michelle Pfeiffer ("Up Close and Personal") as a drug enforcement agent-slash-distaff James Bond. (Columbia)

"A COOL DRY PLACE" "Swingers'" Vince Vaughn has signed to star in this drama, about a lawyer whose wife ("Con Air's" Monica Potter) leaves him and their young son. He moves with his son to Kansas, where he meets a new love interest (Joey Lauren Adams of "Chasing Amy"). Trouble arises when the mother shows up one day to reclaim the son. (Fox)

"SNAKE EYES" "Mission: Impossible's" director Brian De Palma and scripter David Koepp will reteam in this film about a corrupt city detective who becomes a hero when he discovers the man responsible for assassinating the Secretary of Defense. Nicolas Cage ("Face/Off") is attached to star, and Tim Robbins ("Nothing to Lose") is in talks to sign on. (Paramount)

"SCREAM AGAIN" Though her character was killed off in the first "Scream," Drew Barrymore will be making a cameo in its sequel. Neve Campbell, Courteney Cox, David Arquette, Liev Schreiber and Jamie Kennedy will reprise their roles, and Jerry O'Connell ("Jerry Maguire"), Laurie Metcalf ("Dear God"), Jada Pinkett ("Set It Off") and Sarah Michelle Gellar (TV's "Buffy the Vampire Slayer") will also star. Director Wes Craven and scripter Kevin Williamson will also return. (Miramax)

"MY GIANT" Billy Crystal ("Fathers' Day") will play an unscrupulous agent who tries to exploit a sweet but naive basketball player (Washington Bullets center Gheorghe Muresan) in this comedy. Kathleen Quinlan ("Breakdown") will play the agent's estranged wife. (Distribution is to be set)

"SYLVIA" The off-Broadway comedy hit about a dog who causes jealousy in a marriage is being brought to the bigscreen with director Lawrence Kasdan ("French Kiss") at the helm. Steve Martin and Diane Keaton, who played husband and wife in the "Father of the Bride" movies, will again play spouses. The husband sees the dog as an understanding companion, while the wife views the canine as competition. Her stance is more understandable given the fact that the role of the dog was portrayed onstage by Sarah Jessica Parker. The film incarnation of the pulchritudinous pooch has not yet been cast. Martin will also script the adaptation. (Paramount)

"THE OPPOSITE OF SEX" A girl ("That Darn Cat's" Christina Ricci) runs away to see her gay brother, but complications arise when she gets involved with his boyfriend. Lisa Kudrow ("Romy and Michele's High School Reunion"), Martin Donovan ("The Portrait of a Lady"), Johnny Galecki ("Suicide Kings") and Lyle Lovett ("Ready to Wear") also star. Don Roos, who wrote "Boys on the Side," scripts and makes his directorial debut. (Distribution is to be set)

ET CETERA: Christopher Lloyd will star as the titular extraterrestrial in Buena Vista's "My Favorite Martian." Jeff Daniels will co-star as the reporter who takes the martian into his home, pretending the alien is his uncle ..."Lanai-Loa," a supernatural ghost story that will be the first release from Francis Ford Coppola's and Wayne Wang's production company, Chrome Dragon, will shoot in China and will star Angus MacFadyen ("Braveheart") as a cop who is drawn into a web of murder...Casper Van Dien, Rod Steiger, Craig Ferguson and Natasha Wagner will star in "Revenant," a thriller about hip vampires living in L.A.

MODERN MAJOR GENERAL

General Cinema Celebrates 75 Years By Looking to the Future by Pat Kramer

When BOXOFFICE asked some of the employees of General Cinema Theatres (GCT) what has most contributed to the company's success in 75 years of service, the answer we kept eceiving was "good customer service—General Cinema listens to its ustomers." (See related story, page 16). Known as a family-oriented xhibition circuit throughout its three-quarters of a century in business, ieneral Cinema's mission statement remains, "Service first, entertainnent always." Says Paul Del Rossi, president and CEO of GCT (the eventh largest circuit in the country, according to BOXOFFICE's last iants of Exhibition poll), "We think of ourselves as an entertainnent company, not just an exhibition circuit. What we strive for in ur business strategy is servicing the customer. People can go nywhere to a movie theatre. We want them to come to our theatre. ow do we distinguish it? By the quality of our service."

A family-owned business now in its third generation, General Cinema Theatres was founded n the Greater Boston area in 1922 by the late hilip Smith. Known as a businessman with a een farsightedness, Smith opened one of the first uccessful "auto theatres" in the U.S. in 1935, aving the way for the growth of the chain, then nown as Midwest Drive-Ins.

By the '50s, Philip and his son, Richard, connued GCT's tradition of trend-setting, seizing pon what they saw as the next major trend in onsumer habits: the shopping mall. Built in 951, GCT's single-screen Framingham Cinema t Shoppers World in Framingham, Mass., is elieved to have been the first suburban theatre ocated in the same complex as a shopping center. he convenience of dining and shopping around ie moviegoing experience proved so popular iat, by 1966, GCT was the largest shopping enter theatre operator in the country, according o Del Rossi.

With their exhibition chain thriving, the Smith amily began diversifying their business interests n the late '50s, opening drive-in restaurants, offee shops and bowling alleys. In 1960, the ompany went public, and changed its name to ieneral Drive-Ins. Then, as further acquisitions ere made, the company became known as Genral Cinema Corporation (GCC).

Through the '60s, '70s and '80s, GCC invested n radio and TV stations and retail furniture showooms, and helped finance several films. But the usiness which brought the greatest returns was merican Beverage Corporation, which they urchased in '68, leading to the formation of CC Beverages. By 1989, when they sold the ompany, they had grown from five production acilities in three states to 20 in 29 states, making iem the largest independent soft drink bottler in the nation and Pepsi's rgest franchisee.

GCC's other core businesses include the Neiman Marcus Group which includes Neiman Marcus, Bergdorf Goodman and Contempo asuals specialty retail stores) and the publishing company Harcourt race Jovanovich. With their acquisition of the publishing company in 91, the company name changed again from General Cinema Corporaon to Harcourt General. General Cinema Theatres was then spun off om the main company, Harcourt General, and now operates as a ivision of General Cinema Companies, Inc. (The familiar GCC logo efers to General Cinemas Companies, though the theatre arm refers to self as GCT).

Still a family-run business, Richard Smith is chairman and CEO of CC, while his son, Rob, serves as president and COO of GCC. Over t General Cinema Theatres, the "Johnny Come Lately" (as he refers to imself) in the Smith family business is president and CEO Paul Del Rossi. Del Rossi joined the company 17 years ago, after working in the venture capital business with The Boston Company and at national management consulting firm Arthur D. Little. By contributing expertise from outside the exhibition industry, Del Rossi says he's been able to bring different ideas to the business. But he notes that film has always been a passion: Since the time he saw his first animated Disney film, he's always had a love for the movies.

As the driving force behind the continued success and growth of the Chestnut Hill, Mass.-based exhibition circuit (currently with 1,250 screens in 186 locations in 24 states), Del Rossi has continued to uphold General Cinema's "Service first, entertainment always" goal. Citing the Smith family's historical precedent in presenting new innovations to the market, Del Rossi says, "We've always been a leader in sight and sound developments. We were the first theatre circuit to install THX sound systems in 1985. And there's always been a focus on providing exemplary customer service."

"People can go anywhere to a movie theatre. We want them to come to our theatre. How do we distinguish it? By the quality of our service."
—Paul Del Rossi

With the current massive increase in movie theatres in the U.S., Del Rossi believes innovation is key to remaining competitive in a market whose screen count has tripled over the past two decades. "The way you combat this is in [providing] service and innovation: audiovisual innovation, theatre design innovation, and where you locate your theatres—in or near entertainment retail."

GCT's five-year plan for their rapidly-growing circuit includes 350 to 400 new screens, all equipped with digital sound and stadium seating. GCT is also looking at international expansion in Europe and Latin America.

The circuit's biggest new news is a recently-inked partnership agreement with Robert Redford's Sundance Group, under which they'll be building a new chain called Sundance Cinemas. Located in city and suburban areas as well as in college towns, the cinemas will be art-house theatres with six to 10 screens, the first of which Del Rossi hopes to have up and running within a year.

One of GCT's newest multiplexes, the Northbrook Court 14, located in a suburb of Chicago, Ill., exemplifies how far exhibition can go. The Northbrook Court 14 is situated in an upscale shopping mall, offering an expanded entertainment experience. Says Frank Mack, general manager of the theatre, "Northbrook has all the latest, state-of-the-art items that people want in a theatre." This includes two self-serve concession stands selling branded items like Starbucks coffees and Pizzeria Uno. The theatres, with stadium seating for a total of 3,251 patrons, are located on two levels, with a cafe on the mid-level. Two of the auditoriums are THX-certified, and all 14 theatres are equipped to provide all three digital-sound capabilities. Ten mobile digital systems are available: five Dolby Digital, three DTS, and two SDDS. By having them on movable carts, Mack says they can provide whatever sound system is needed for a particular feature.

Since its grand opening last November, the Northbrook Court 14 has been very successful. Says Mack, "The town of Northbrook is, I think, very pleased with the design of the theatre. It's very glitzy in its look and the way it's laid out. It lends a lot of mystique to Northbrook. Many people are in awe over the look of the theatre and concept."

The design, however, is but a small part of the overall appeal. In keeping with the GCT philosophy of service and family-oriented programming, Northbrook launched their highly-successful "Summer Movie Camp" program in June. The eight-week series featured weekly matinees at 10:00 a.m. and noon, with games, prizes, singalongs and special guests in conjunction with the feature showing. Ronald McDonald and Chuck E. Cheese made appearances, and demonstrations were given by a local fire department. For the low admission price of $2.50, the kids got a full show as well as free popcorn and a drink.

"To service the community," says Mack, "we try to provide tie-ins with vendors for discount coupons at the concession stands as well as tie-ins with the adjacent stores in the mall." Through this type of exchange, positive relations are also built with area businesses. He adds, "We are really reaching out to what the customers expect when they go to see a film. It's very important that everyone get their money's worth. People come to the movies as an escape and they want two hours of enjoyment—and everything has to be perfect. It has to be fine-tuned to make the event special, with excellent customer service. The presentation must be flawless and employees and management must be focused on the fact that the moviegoing experience must be second to none."

> "The movies have always been a place of enjoyment, fantasy, escape. Our role in the industry is to perpetuate that. I want our company to be recognized as the 'best in class.'"

Calling his chosen line of work "enjoyable," Mack notes that, while the hours are sometimes long, he enjoys working with the public and his staff to create the enthusiasm that's needed to make the theatre successful. That quality, says Del Rossi, is an essential element in the people who work for General Cinema. "One of the things I try to do is find the best possible managers and give them an opportunity to go as far as they can in the business," he says. In that regard, Del Rossi says, "We've always been known as a fertile training ground for entertainment industry executives," pointing to a list of distinguished General Cinema alumni, including Chuck Viane, senior vice president and general sales manager of Buena Vista Pictures Distributing; Jim Tharp, president of DreamWorks distribution; Tom Sherak, chairman of 20th Century Fox Domestic Film Group and senior executive vice president of Fox Filmed Entertainment; and Barry Reardon, president of Warner Bros. Distributing. Given the track record of some of General Cinema's former employees' success in the entertainment business, Del Rossi says the Smith famil has created a company where the people hired are top-flight. "I thin [the caliber of GCT's personnel] is really the hallmark [of the company and it shows by where these people have ended up," he observes.

Of General Cinema's long-term success in exhibition, Del Rossi says "We are part of one of the mainstream cultural themes in the country the movies. The movies have always been a place of enjoyment, fantasy escape. Our role in the industry is t perpetuate that. I want our company t be recognized by theatregoers, our com petitors, and the studios as the 'best i class.' We want to be right up there at th top when they think of companies tha exemplify the moviegoing experience."

In keeping with the Smith family's ques to be innovative, this December, GC opens their newest multiplex: a 16-scree theatre (renovated from a former six-scree theatre) located at Chicago's Yorktow Mall. Two of the 16 auditoriums will b "premium" theatres with deluxe accom modations for 150 patrons. With very large over-stuffed chairs and extra leg room, th theatres are being built with comfort in mind. Tickets will be availabl by advance reservation, and food and beverage service will be provide by cafe located between the two theatres. Seat-side food service wi also be available, with orders taken right at the seats. Del Rossi liken this experience to "flying first class." Based upon the demand for this typ of theatre, General Cinemas will be looking to duplicate the premium theatr concept, retrofitting some of their existing theatres.

With innovation always in the forefront of GCT's plans, Del Ross notes that their basic philosophy hasn't changed since the business wa founded in the '20s. "At the end of the day in this industry it's pret simple: create the best possible moviegoing experience. Sometimes it the technology, sometimes it's what's on the screen, sometimes it customer service—making a person feel welcome. Those things reall haven't changed."

Northbrook Court 14 Staff Members Reveal Secrets of GCT's Success by Pat Kramer

Frank Mack, Northbrook Court 14 General Manager

What do you like about the exhibition business?

I think it's exciting. Movies always seem to be the talk of Monday morning conversations. [It's great] just to be a part of that, the openings, especially with big blockbusters. It's an ever-changing business. It's very intriguing and there's always something new to plan for.

What is most fulfilling about your job?

The idea of supplying a means of entertainment to the public—the satisfaction that you see on their faces as they walk out of the theatre [which demonstrates] that we're successful in creating a good escape environment for our patrons.

What is it about General Cinema that's enabled the company to be successful for the past 75 years?

I think it starts as the top: the upper management has always been solid and supportive of the industry. They've really been very innovative with different concepts and through those opportunities of change, they've stayed ahead of the competition, always trying to obtain a better means of providing the customers with more than just the movie.

Steve Fischel, Senior Supervisor

What do you like about the exhibition business?

It's a rewarding, exciting business. It's interesting seeing different movies that come out, seeing different people who come out and enjoy our movies.

What is most fulfilling about your job?

Working with great management, seeing what people like to see, seeing return customers back for other movies, seeing their satisfaction.

What is it about General Cinema that's enabled it to be successful for the past 75 years?

Customer service has always been number one. We take care of our customers—we treat them as if they are a guest in our house, not as a customer.

Brandy Werner, Cashier

What do you like about the exhibition business?

I love it. I've been with this company for five years, off and on. I love being able to see people's reactions to the movies. I love seeing people enjoy their entertainment.

What is most fulfilling about your job?

Seeing the faces of the little kids when they come out. I have four nieces and I love taking them to the movies, seeing their new experiences. Adults are funny too, with their reactions to special effects.

What is it about GCT that's enabled it to be successful for the past 75 years?

I believe they listen to their customers. If a customer suggests something, they take it into consideration and they go through all the channels, trying to do what their customers would like them to do.

John Vance, Chief Projectionist

What do you like about the exhibition business?

I've been in this business for 32 years and have seen many ups and downs. Today, we're a very viable industry. There are so many new and exciting technological advances coming on board and it greatly enhances the moviegoing experience for our customers.

What is most fulfilling about your job?

I love to see a full auditorium and I like to see the audience totally involved in the film, whether they're gasping or laughing. I take pride that in some small way, I helped contribute to their enjoyment.

What is it about GCT that's enabled it to be successful for the past 75 years?

Customer satisfaction, clean and well-maintained theatres, quality presentations, and professionalism. They're very concerned about the patrons and the job that's done and the fact that customers are getting a good presentation and are happy.

BLOOD &THUNDER

Cult Mystery Author JAMES ELLROY's Tough, Bloody Vision At Last Makes It to the Screen with Warner's "L.A. CONFIDENTIAL"

by Ray Greene

"What I want in a story is psychological gravity, plot density. I want deeply ambiguous, darkly driven, deeply committed, passionate men, riding the wave of history on a huge canvas. And I hate the noble loner myth.

"I am a 49-year-old white man, basically conservative in temperament. I am Protestant to the core. And I would rather err on the side of authority. I respect cops much more than I dislike them. I understand the ambiguities inherent in their lives. I understand the corruption of institutions. And I understand the passion of men who need to impose authority on other people because their inner lives are chaotic. I see my vision as moral."

The Argyle Hotel (aka The Sunset Tower) is one of those rare spaces in the changeable L.A. landscape where history seems to stand still. It's an art deco masterpiece—the kind of building that defined L.A. architecture before a post-WWII mania for prefabricated functionalism joined forces with L.A.'s pervasive contempt for its own past in an autodestruct act that consigned many of the most beautiful structures the town would ever see to the wrecking ball.

The Argyle survived all that—just barely, and thanks only to a last-minute infusion of foreign capital in 1986. To walk through the hotel's doors is to rub shoulders with ghosts—the outsize kind, the jumbo variety.

John Wayne lived here for awhile, and cryptic billionaire Howard Hughes haunted the Argyle's halls before retiring to weirdo oblivion in his penthouse on the Vegas Strip. Paulette Godard, ZaSu Pitts, Joe Schenck, Billie Burke, all left their signatures in the Argyle's guestbook, as did that most Hollywood of Hollywood gangsters, the redoubtable Benjamin "Bugsy" Siegel, en route to his premature death by gunfire in a Beverly Hills mansion.

The interior is a perfect presentation of a vanished time, right down to the elevator doors and ashtrays. It feels like any door could open onto a black and white, Tinseltown world of

I hate the noble loner myth. My guys are the toadies of the fascist system. To me, that's crime fiction in the twentieth century.

impossible violence or unthinkable romance. Pressed for an adjective, a certain kind of writer might describe the effect as "Chandleresque."

But not James Ellroy, contemporary king of a noir/pulp literary netherworld still most associated with Raymond Chandler in the popular mind. A cult crime novelist who has managed the leap into the critical and popular mainstream Chandler himself never pulled off, the bulk of Ellroy's signature works—"The Black Dahlia," "The Big Nowhere," "L.A. Confidential" and "White Jazz," popularly referred to as Ellroy's "L.A. Quartet," as well as six earlier novels—have often been likened to Chandler, owing to their L.A. milieus and the fact that they revolve around the investigation of violent crime. It's an obvious if unjustified analogy, and one Ellroy has never been comfortable with; "Chandleresque" could easily be this particular wordsmith's least favorite word.

"Ah, f--k," he says, leaning back against a chair in the bookless room the Argyle refers to as its "library." "That c--ks--ker." Ellroy sits bolt upright, his eyes gone serious beneath his wire rim glasses. "I'm not a fan. I reread Chandler as an adult—I loved him as a kid—and I was amazed how little Chandler knew about people. I was amazed at how slipshod his plots were, and how often his fabled style just didn't work. I thought the stories were schmaltzy, corny and filled with male self-pity. My guys are the toadies of the fascist system. To me, that's crime fiction in the 20th century.

"I understand Chandler's popularity," Ellroy adds. "I understand how easy it is for contemporary writers to adapt his stuff to their particular prejudices. Thus you've got the black private eye who sees all, who's noble, who exists outside the mainstream with the X-ray eye vision into everything petty and corrupt and meanspirited. Or the lesbian private eye or the gay private eye or the Chinese private eye or the lesbian, gay, handicapped, Chinese, gay, black, Irish-Catholic private eye. I don't buy it at all. I think it's a cheap shot, and cheap shit all the way."

Obviously, Ellroy is a man of strong opinions. A writer who knows his own mind, and hasn't a qualm about expressing it. He has an extremely high opinion of his output; he once referred to himself as "the greatest crime novelist who ever lived," then said he regretted the self-description only because it was too limited to the genre that made him a star.

To the growing readership that follows his work, the cocksure attitude is completely justified. Ellroy's intricate, complex policiers are like nothing anyone else in contemporary fiction is trying to do: as plot-driven as an airport paperback, but as complicated as a cubist painting, as dense and lyrical as a fugue.

"L.A. Confidential"—the first of his major works to make it to the bigscreen and the nominal subject under consideration on this hot July afternoon—is a perfect case in point. Set in '50s L.A. against a backdrop involving multiple murders, scandal sheet journalism, highjacked heroin, extra-legal police intrigue, and a Hollywood prostitution racket that makes Heidi Fleiss look like a boulevard pavement pounder, the screen version of "L.A. Confidential" has more plotlines than most TV mini-series. There are not one but three "hero cop" protagonists, and in true Ellroy fashion, each is deeply, almost desperately flawed. Bud White (played by Russell Crowe in the film) is a part-time vigilante who likes to find and punish wife abusers because of a horrific secret in his own past: as a child, he watched his father beat his mother to death with a tire iron, then spent four days handcuffed to a bed while the body decomposed before his eyes. Ed Exley (Guy Pearce) is both a brilliant investigator and an ambitious martinet willing to rat out other officers to advance his career. For superslick detective Jack Vincennes (Kevin Spacey), money-grubbing publicity stunts are his real profession: adviser to the "Dragnet"-like TV series "Badge of Honor," he keeps his name in the papers by accepting payola from a Confidential Magazine-like tabloid called Hush Hush in exchange for providing photo-op busts of celebrity dopers.

At two hours and 16 minutes, "L.A. Confidential" is already long by Hollywood release standards. Even at that length, half Ellroy's plot was left out. A child-murdering serial killer is missing in action—one "Dr. Frankenstein," known for his attempt to assemble a perfect playmate out of body parts butchered from his prepubescent victims. The bastard offspring of the Walt Disney-esque animation king Raymond Dieterling and the sordid creation of Dieterling's movie-driven '50s theme park Dream-a-Dreamland have also been excised. Ellroy-authored love interests for Vincennes and Exley are absent—a singularly significant omission, given that Ellroy describes the moral argument of his work in terms of the fact that "all my guys are capable of love and dying to give it up for some woman... All my guys are chumps for love."

"My dialogue is there in force," says Ellroy of the screen adaptation, "but it's been reworked. My characters have been pushed to the background, moved to the forefront, plotlines have been cut, jiggled, reworked extensively... None of the guys have the extensive character arc that they do in the book. And they can't possibly. Unless you were to have made a movie that's two or three times as long, and that would cover the entire [event structure of the novel]."

The bottom line is that Ellroy's novels are just too damn big for the movies—or so their author once thought. "My agent and I laughed like hell when we sold the movie option to [producer] David Wolper. 'How's anybody ever going to adapt this thing for the movies?'"

Enter Curtis Hanson, director of "The Hand That Rocks the Cradle" and "The River Wild." A self-described Ellroy freak who has said of the author that "his is the quintessential voice of L.A.," Hanson impressed Ellroy right from the start as somebody who just might be able to do the impossible by successfully translating his work to the screen.

"Curtis Hanson came to me only when he was reasonably sure that the film would be made," says Ellroy, whose works (most notably "The Black Dahlia") have been optioned in the past only to languish for years in that bottomless Hollywood maw known as "development hell." "I liked the guy immediately... I read two drafts of the script, [and] at the time I thought, 'I wouldn't do it this way.' But at the same time I knew full well I'm not a filmmaker. I don't want to be a filmmaker. I don't aspire to be a filmmaker in any way, shape, manner or form."

Visiting the set of "L.A. Confidential" and seeing characters which he had lived with for so long made flesh was a revelation to Ellroy. "I went to the set and I saw Paul Guilfoyle play [real-life gangster] Mickey Cohen. Here's a man who looks rather as Mickey Cohen did in the early 1950s, coming down the City Hall steps—in period garb, surrounded by period automobiles. It was a wonderfully dense little piece of footage.

"Then Curtis had me out to the editing room and showed me about seven minutes of the film, and I had my first startling minute with it, which was seeing James Cromwell as [corrupt police captain] Dudley Smith. Here's a character who appears in more books than any other one of my characters—'Clandestine,' 'The Big Nowhere,' 'L.A. Confidential' and 'White Jazz.' Here's this [actor] who's imperiously tall—about six-foot-six or seven, cocky, intelligent, sandy-haired, great looking in his way, with the same brogue that I gave [the character] in four of my books. 'Whoa! What's that?'"

This picture of the 10-year-old James Ellroy was taken by a news photographer just moments after he learned of his mother's death.

Ellroy might have been expected to object to the necessary changes that had been made to make "L.A. Confidential" work onscreen. He is, after all, a writer who prides himself on the sheer construction of his work, and who has said repeatedly that, in his fiction, "every word means something." But Hanson's devotion to the spirit if not the letter of Ellroy's story paid off. "I love the movie," Ellroy says. "What you've got is an amazingly dense, mysterious, complex ensemble piece... It's a work of art that exists on its own level, [but at the same time] it's recognizably me."

Asked if potential readers unfamiliar with his more complicated and far more violent novels will find the movie version of "L.A. Confidential" a fair introduction to his work, Ellroy doesn't miss a beat. "I've long contended that hard-boiled crime fiction is the story of bad white men doing bad things in the name of authority," he says. "I think people get that point... People that say, 'Boy, that was really good, I want more' will be able to walk out of the theatre and into the Barnes & Noble there in the mall and buy not only the movie tie-in edition of 'L.A. Confidential,' but Curtis Hanson and Brian Helgeland's screenplay, which is being published, and 'My Dark Places' in trade paperback as well."

My Dark Places" is a subject unto itself. Ellroy's most recent book-length work and also his bestselling volume ever, it departs from the overall pattern of his

"CONFIDENTIAL" CHAT

Born and raised in Los Angeles, Curtis Hanson was a natural to direct the screen version of James Ellroy's novel "L.A. Confidential." In addition to being a native son, Hanson was also a longtime fan of Ellroy's work. And though he'd never directed a period movie before, he was on familiar ground with the story's motifs of deception, betrayal, and violence.

Hanson, whose previous work includes "The Bedroom Window," "The Hand That Rocks the Cradle," "Bad Influence" and "The River Wild," is a writer/director who specializes in exposing the dark undercurrents beneath seemingly calm surfaces. So great was his affinity for the project that Hanson signed on as director, co-screenwriter, co-producer, and music supervisor. The director says the result is his most personal film to date.

BOXOFFICE: How did you approach the task of adapting such a dense, complex novel to the screen?

CURTIS HANSON: I was fortunate to find a gifted collaborator in [co-scripter] Brian Helgeland. Brian had been pursuing "L.A. Confidential" independent of me, and in fact he was going to pitch it to Warners. But then he learned that I was already doing it. So he came to me and we talked it over. And it was a huge advantage because not only is Brian a really talented writer, but he also loved Ellroy's book. When we were working together we'd be each other's watchdog. We would try to be as true as we could to the characters and sacrifice what we needed of the plot without sacrificing the moments of character. And I think that's what impressed Ellroy—the script was still in his voice, which was important because that's what brought us there in the first place.

BOXOFFICE: How important to you was the look of "L.A. Confidential"?

HANSON: It was important that it seem authentic, but I didn't want the period aspect of the story to overwhelm the audience. When I started out, every time I met with a potential collaborator, I gave a photo presentation of archival shots of L.A. from the 1950s that essentially represented my vision of the film. Once we were in preproduction, I would show the creative team a film a week, such as Nick Ray's "In a Lonely Place" and Robert Aldrich's "Kiss Me Deadly"—films that were contemporary to the time.

BOXOFFICE: With urban crime, police corruption and amoral characters, you're dealing with a lot of film noir themes here, and yet clearly you decided not to go with a noir-style mise-en-scene.

HANSON: That's true. We were very deliberately not doing a film that was about a noir mood. True noir, of course, expresses a certain attitude that is dark and full of fatalism, but also an attitude that was organic to the time that it was made. To do that today would be phony. The world is different today, and I wasn't interested in doing an homage to something that doesn't exist anymore. The point was to create a story that, like Ellroy's book, is set in the past but not of the past. The '50s was actually a very forward-looking period in Los Angeles, and I wanted that to show in the film.

BOXOFFICE: The film's music is also typical of the period. What guided your selection process for the songs?

HANSON: I had picked many of the songs before we started shooting, because I wanted them to help define characters and enhance themes. Also, I'm fascinated with the difference between appearance and reality, and to me the songs were a good way of underscoring this difference. For instance, in the beginning when Danny DeVito is narrating about the difference between the image and the reality of Los Angeles, I have Johnny Mercer singing "Accentuate the Positive" in the background.

BOXOFFICE: What led to the decision to cast two Australians, Russell Crowe and Guy Pearce, in the central roles as American cops?

HANSON: It was important that we have actors in these roles who the audience could take at face value, and Russell and Guy were relatively unknown. They were also believable. When you meet these characters you make certain assumptions about them, but as the story goes along you start to question your assumptions and reevaluate them.

BOXOFFICE: What is the essence of Los Angeles to you?

HANSON: L.A. is a city that's almost famous for its apparent disregard of its own past, and yet the past is everywhere, which we found when we were scouting locations. There are a lot of cities that it's easy to get a handle on: New York, Paris—you see them and you're blown away. L.A. isn't like that at all. You get here and you wonder, "Where is it?" I think L.A. is what you make of it. And it's challenging in that way, because to understand this city you really have to work at it.—Lael Loewenstein career in several obvious—not to mention intricate and intriguing—ways.

It is nonfiction, first of all, and, singularly for a writer who says his idea of good writing always includes the biggest imaginable social and historic canvas, it revolves around a single, unsolved crime. It is also the book that is the key to all the others, a searing, almost masochistically detailed look at the event which, according to Ellroy, is "certainly the pivotal event in my life. That's what shaped my intellectual curiosity, and more than anything else, that's why we're sitting here talking to each other right now."

The crime in question is the brutal murder of Ellroy's mother, Jean, back in 1958, when Ellroy was just 10 years old. That occurrence explains not only Ellroy's deep fascination with criminal behavior but the current of almost inexplicably savage violence that runs through his work; his obsession with the details of police investigatory procedures; even his fixation on '50s Los Angeles, the town where his mother did much of her living, and just a little bit east of which she ultimately did her dying.

Ellroy had already dealt with his mother's death in fictional form: his breakthrough novel, 1987's "The Black Dahlia," imposed an imaginary solution on one of L.A.'s most notorious unsolved murders and was dedicated to his mother's memory. "My mother was not Elizabeth Short," Ellroy says of parallels with the Dahlia case's victim. "I used Elizabeth Short and her death as a symbiotic stand-in for my mother and hers. But they were different women—markedly so. In some ways I thought I had dealt with my mother when I wrote 'The Black Dahlia.' I was mistaken. I had to go out and confront the literal woman."

To "confront the literal woman," Ellroy brought his considerable research skills to bear on the original investigation and mounted a new investigation of his own, then organized the resulting data into an account he calls "my autobiography, really." The press the book received was both ecstatic and sensationalist—a combination which sells a lot of copies. The more interesting question, though, is the personal one: namely, did writing "My Dark Places" help Ellroy lay anything to rest?

"Well no, it didn't resolve anything," he says. "There'll never be any closure, and as I say in the book, closure's a preposterous concept. I wouldn't want closure if I could have it. I think my relationship with her will ever mutate. May end with the cessation of my consciousness when I die, and may continue onto some wild-ass plain after my death. No. It was a great confrontation, and now my mother is with me, and that's all to the good."

"My Dark Places" went even further than the grim details of Jean Ellroy's death, chronicling Ellroy's own youthful slide into alcoholic and chemical oblivion as well as his perverse career as a petty criminal and "panty sniffer." Surprisingly, Ellroy lived out an early life that is a lot closer to the pathologies of the criminals who wend their way through his fictions than it is to his police protagonists. "I never hated cops," he says. "I never blamed society for making me who I was. I never blamed my parents. You can point to my mother's murder, but frankly, my wig wasn't on too tight before my mother's murder. I think if you shake my mother's family tree back in Europe and my father's, it'd be full of drunks and drug addicts and panty sniffers and general shitbirds. In some sense I think it was a genetic sentence."

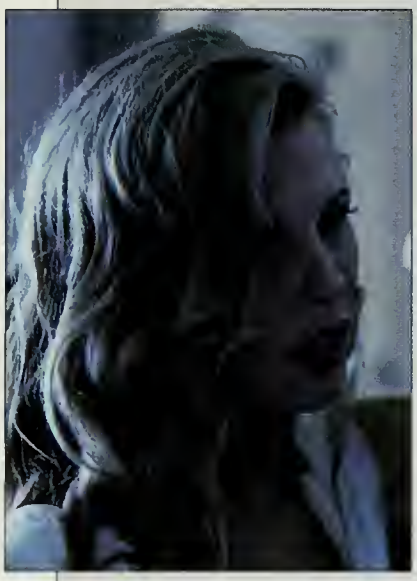
His work shows a detailed understanding of the criminal mind, but with virtually no sympathy for criminal motives. "You take a guy like me," he says, "who quit drinking, quit stealing, quit taking drugs, quit breaking into houses and sniffing women's undergarments. Once you've turned your life around like that, you're a little bit impatient with people who haven't done it. If I were a government figure, and thank God I'm not, frankly, I would rather err on the side of judgement more than of permissiveness and forgiveness. I think the world could use more of that, and less of the latter."

In his most recent novel, Ellroy put both Los Angeles as a primary locale and police investigations as a structuring device behind him, and he claims he'll never look back. Set in the early 1960s, 1995's "American Tabloid" was an imaginary history of a parallel assassination plot against JFK—a historical figure Ellroy loathes.



If it was a departure, it was a characteristic one: elaborate, multi-layered, bone-fascinated with the secrets behind the secrets of the American experience, a book that essentially proposed that the organizing principle of American history isn't capitalism or democracy but criminality itself. Abetted by the muscle of his publisher, Knopf, and his own growing reputation, it outsold every one of his previous fictions and became Time Magazine's selection as Novel of the Year.

"American Tabloid" was part one of what Ellroy calls his "Underworld U.S.A." trilogy, which will focus on behind-the-scenes intrigue in the national political arena during the '60s and early '70s. As he moves closer to contemporary times, the thought occurs that Ellroy (who has yet to revisit a period after treating it in one of his books) may be edging himself into extinction. It's an idea he dispels with an Ellroyesque monologue on current American politics that demonstrates how the man finds material everywhere.

"Look at Bill Clinton," he says. "Whatever you think of him—and frankly, I was glad to get the Republicans out and get Big Bill in. Tell me he isn't dirty from his toes to the top of his head. Tell me he isn't financed by dirty money. Tell me he hasn't lined his pockets. Yeah. Tell me he isn't a sleazy c--ks--ker who whips out his d--k on women left and right. Yeah. Tell me that you don't believe Paula Jones."

He leans back, the lenses of his glasses magnifying the obsessive gleam in his eyes. "America was never innocent," he says, in words that might just add up to the artist's worldview. "We popped our cherry on the boat over, and looked back with no regrets."

"L.A." WOMAN

L.A. Confidential" marks Kim Basinger's return to the bigscreen after an absence of nearly two-and-a-half years, during which she gave birth to a daughter, Ireland, now 20 months old. The actress, who says, "I have the worst record for picking projects," has been getting some of her best reviews for her portrayal of a high-priced hooker who incarnates Veronica Lake in a Hollywood brothel based on period movie stars.

A successful model before heading to Hollywood, the Georgia native made her feature debut in 1984's "The Natural." Subsequent films included "9 1/2 Weeks," "No Mercy," "Batman," "The Marrying Man" (on which she met husband Alec Baldwin) and "Final Analysis." But she made headlines less for her acting ability than for her allegedly "difficult" behavior on set. A lawsuit over her decision not to appear in the film "Boxing Helena" forced her into bankruptcy and brought more unwanted publicity (the judgement was substantially reduced on appeal).

Basinger says that those troubled times are behind her. Dressed casually and appearing relaxed, she talked with BOXOFFICE about her latest picture and what she calls "a new time in my life."

BOXOFFICE: How did you get involved with "L.A. Confidential"?

KIM BASINGER: My initial meeting with [director] Curtis Hanson was at the Formosa Cafe [a famous Hollywood hangout that figures in the movie]. He pulled out pictures of that era and presented a visual presentation. He just lured me into this world. I had never before been approached by a director who told me I was going to do a part. Not asked me, told me. Curtis decided I was Lynn Bracken, that I was the only person who could do this job. We're all little kids who have egos and insecurities. You want to be believed in. When a director stares into your eyes and says, "You're her!" that presents you with a challenge you want to live up to.

BOXOFFICE: What attracted you to the project?

BASINGER: After reading the script, I wasn't sure I wanted to play a call girl, the sweet whore. But I loved Curtis and that he had so much belief in me. And I loved the dialogue, and I loved the idea of going into Veronica Lake's life. By day, Lynn Bracken was Veronica Lake, so I had to capture a little bit of her spirit.

If this movie does only one thing, I hope it resurrects Veronica Lake. We lost a very great star at a very young age—I think the business really threw her for a loop. She was so talented and so misunderstood. She was known more for her "peekaboo" hair than her ability, but she was an amazing actress. She had it down.

BOXOFFICE: The tabloid press figures prominently in the story. Certainly, you're no stranger to that.

BASINGER: It's funny but I never thought about that. I think the movie's theme is "facade." It's about something you're not—what's real and what isn't.

BOXOFFICE: How have you dealt with being the brunt of a lot of negative publicity?

BASINGER: I always call it "old noise." Not even old news—it's not even newsworthy. There was a time when I probably should have come out and really faced the press and answered questions and [stood up] for myself. At that time I was incapable of coming out and exposing myself—I was much too shy. I chose to go underground and let it all pass. And when you do that, you really set yourself up for anything that anybody writes about you to become something you will have to live down forever.

BOXOFFICE: "L.A. Confidential" premiered at Cannes. What was that like?

BASINGER: It was indescribable. It was my first time attending. It's like a parade, 24 hours a day. I have never seen so many flashbulbs in my life. Walking up that red carpet at the Palais I told [co-stars] Russell Crowe and Guy Pearce to hold on to me—I was terrified I might trip! I don't know how those women do it—get out of the car and twirl around for the camera in those high heels!

BOXOFFICE: Critics are already saying this is your best screen work in quite some time.

BASINGER: Everything was right on this one—the director, the script, my demeanor toward the material, my co-stars. Everything just came together so beautifully. And I'll give myself some credit, too, in that I wasn't in any hurry. I just wanted to do a wonderful job. I wanted to do what I'm capable of doing.

BOXOFFICE: Do you think you've changed since the birth of your daughter? And has that affected your personal life?

BASINGER: Ireland's birth is the best thing I have ever done in my life, or ever will do. Children change you. Basically, you no longer have any time to focus on your own crap. It's so immediate, what's important and what isn't.—Jean Oppenheimer

OCTOBER TRAILERS

With so many booking selections, this must be the season of the which

Except for a few bright lights like "Men In Black" and "Face/Off," summer 1997 was downright disappointing. Despite lots of big-budget movies carefully arranged to avoid demographic competition on opening weekend, the likes of "Batman & Robin" and "Speed 2: Cruise Control" debuted at lesser numbers than expected—and then plummeted. Now comes fall, and exhibitors are hoping the Halloween season bears more treats than tricks. There's certainly plenty of candy to unwrap in October, with 15 major studio releases and 23 independent and interdependent offerings in distributors' goodybags.

With that rise in releases comes congestion. All seeking the male demo on the Oct. 3 weekend are four wide openers: an Oliver Stone film, a thriller and two horror flicks. The Oct. 17 date—which boasts the month's superstar film, the Al Pacino-Keanu Reeves "Devil's Advocate," with otherworldly leanings—also has two new sci-fi movies and a crime drama whose lead's fan base is the SF contingent. On Oct. 24, two thrillers—one psychological, one supernatural—go after chill fans. Only the 10/10 week (and 10/31 by default—it has just one entry) has good balance: a dramatic biopic and a Disney family film.

Of course, the more demo congestion there is among high-profile releases, the more chance there is for a sleeper title to break out. Key among these are 10/17's British comedy "Bean" and two 10/24 openers, "A Life Less Ordinary" (from the "Trainspotting"/"Shallow Grave" team) and the family fantasy/drama "FairyTale: A True Story" (see photo above). All in all, the month has some magic to it but might need a little extra dose of wizardry; one hopes it's enchantment and not necromancy.

U-Turn

Sean Penn ("She's So Lovely") stars as a drifter who gets involved with a married woman ("Anaconda's" Jennifer Lopez). This Phoenix presentation (an Illusion Entertainment/Clyde Is Hungry production) was known as "Stray Dogs." Nick Nolte, Claire Danes ("Romeo & Juliet"), Billy Bob Thornton ("Sling Blade"), Powers Boothe ("Sudden Death"), Joaquin Phoenix ("Inventing the Abbotts") and Julie Hagerty co-star. Oliver Stone directs; John Ridley adapts his novel; Mike Medavoy produces. (TriStar, 10/3 wide)

Exploitips: With its multiple-name cast and the Stone (and Medavoy) imprimatur, "U-Turn" boasts a high profile even before the usual Stone publicity engine kicks into gear. What he's not likely to hype is his recent stone-cool reception at the boxoffice: In the '90s, Stone's films have averaged under $35 million domestically (without '91's "JFK," another $10 mil. less)—not the kind of continued return one seeks of big-director, big-name, studio-budget films. This outing, sell the cast: Penn, Lopez, Danes and Thornton all have the cachet to which an audience likes to respond. A bookstore tie-in is a natural.

An American Werewolf in Paris

This sequel to 1981's horror hit "An American Werewolf in London" moves to the City of Light. Julie Delpy ("Before Sunrise"), Tom Everett Scott ("That Thing You Do!") and Julie Bowen star. Anthony Waller ("Mute Witness") directs and scripts; Richard Claus produces. (Buena Vista, 10/3 wide)

Exploitips: Waller's success d'estime "Mute Witness," a smart horror/thriller, leaptrogged him from Sony Classics to Miramax, where this film originated—but both he and this film were upped to studio level. Disney could have timed this closer to Halloween, so highlight the "boo!" season connection by decorating your theatre with monster paraphernalia. Buena Vista has a marketing-muscle edge, but Live's same-date "Wishmaster" has the again salable Wes Craven ("Scream") seal.

Soul Food

"Mother Joe," matriarch of an embattled Chicago family, dishes out not only delicious vittles but also love and wisdom during weekly Sunday-night dinners. When she falls ill, her grandson must be the one to hold the family together. Vanessa Williams ("Hoodlum"), Vivica A. Fox ("Set It Off"), Nia Long ("love jones"), Michael Beach and Mekhi Phifer ("High School High") star. George Tillman Jr. directs and scripts; Tracey Edmonds and Robert Teitel produce, with songwriter/music maven Kenny "Babyface" Edmonds executive producing. (Fox, 10/3 wide)

Exploitips: Although "Soul Food" doesn't have the built-in underserved audience that made "Waiting to Exhale" a $67 million success for Fox, expect the studio to push for similar numbers and similar adult demos (this isn't "Cosby"-type family fare, having been rated R for strong sexuality and language). Urban-aud affection for horror could mean "Soul Food" will lose some heads to the "American Werewolf" sequel and "Wishmaster," and Morgan Freeman's presence in "Kiss the Girls" could also dilute results.

Kiss the Girls

"Seven's" Morgan Freeman stars in this suspense thriller as Dr. Alex Cross, a Washington, D.C. police detective searching for his niece who disappeared in North Carolina. Cross teams up with a local doctor, Kate McTiernan ("A Time to Kill's" Ashley Judd), who has information vital to his investigation. Gary Fleder ("Things to Do in Denver When You're Dead") directs; David Klass adapts the novel by James Patterson; David Brown and Joe Wizan produce. (Paramount, 10/3 wide)

Exploitips: Although the film was held from a February release and was made by Rysher (whose litany of boxoffice underperformers recently caused that company to exit the feature biz), early word on "Kiss the Girls" suggests this is a crackling good work, with Freeman and Judd in top form. The real problem might be profile: Other 10/3 major debuts either have bigger casts or a specific demo base, and quality plays on the screen, not the marquee. Push the leads' credits; both "Seven" and "A Time to Kill" were hits.

Wes Craven Presents Wishmaster

An evil force called Djinn grants people's secret desires in exchange for their souls. This frightfest stars three actors from '80s horror classics: Robert Englund (Freddy Krueger of "Nightmare on Elm Street"), Kane Hodder (Jason of "Friday the 13th") and Tony Todd (Candyman of "Candyman"). Robert Kurtzman ("The Demolitionist") directs; Peter Atkins ("Hellraiser") scripts. (Live, 10/3 wide)

NOTHING ELSE IS A PEPSI™

Exploitips: Horror had gone from shock-'em to schlock-'em before "Scream" ($105 mil. and counting) reinvigorated audience interest in the genre and resuscitated Craven's cachet. Thus Live's wise move to give this a "Presents" status, which the new distributor hopes will support a wide release. The hypability of the Englund/Hodder/Todd trio is another factor that could give this a decent competitive chance against Buena Vista's same-date "American Werewolf" sequel.

Boogie Nights

Set in the porn world's '70s heyday, this dark comedy follows a group of players hoping to revamp the industry. Mark Wahlberg, Julianne Moore, Burt Reynolds, Don Cheadle and William H. Macy star. Paul Thomas Anderson ("Hard 8") directs and scripts; Larry Gordon ("The Devil's Own") produces with John Lyons, Lloyd Levin and JoAnne Sellar. (New Line, 10/3 ltd, 10/10 wide)

Exploitips: "Boogie Nights" (moved from early, then late, summer) could draw extra attention thanks to its sexy subject matter. But exhibitors desiring wide Baby Boomer support could hype the nostalgic '70s-era setting.

Fast, Cheap & Out of Control

Errol Morris, the director of "The Thin Blue Line" and "A Brief History of Time," interweaves four unique stories of quite different characters—a robotics designer, a lion tamer, a man who studies mole rats, and a topiary gardener—in his latest documentary. Featuring Dave Hoover, George Mendonca, Ray Mendez and Rodney Brooks. Morris also produces. (Sony Classics, 10/3 NY/LA)

Exploitips: In a three-star review, our Sundance critic said this film is "less a classically structured documentary than a strangely urgent examination of what the human race is becoming." This is art-house fare, though Morris' social theorizing—that "humans are on a path that could lead to us inventing ourselves out of existence"—should interest techies and non-techies alike.

OCTOBER 10

Seven Years in Tibet

Brad Pitt stars in this epic biopic that tells the story of Austrian mountaineer Heinrich Harrer, who was captured by the British in the Himalayas during World War II but escaped by foot into Tibet, where he was befriended by the young Dalai Lama. David Thewlis ("The Island of Dr. Moreau") and B.D. Wong ("Father of the Bride") co-star. Jean-Jacques Annaud ("Wings of Courage") directs; Becky Johnston ("Bad Girls") scripts; Iain Smith ("City of Joy") and John Williams produce for Mandalay. (TriStar, 10/8 wide)

Exploitips: Pitt's luck is bedeviled: He shepherded "The Devil's Own" only to see it rewritten and perform poorly; his relationship with fiancee Gwyneth Paltrow ends; nude photos of him appear in Playgirl; and now the SS background of the man he plays here comes to light. In a subsequent meeting with Jewish leader Simon Weisenthal, Harrer reportedly implied he joined the infamous Nazi corps as an athletic instructor in 1938 only under pressure, but he didn't mention he joined a Nazi teachers federation in pre-Hitler 1933, when the group was still illegal. Annaud can't want to be regarded as a latter-day Leni Riefenstahl, but his assertion he suspected Harrer's past hardly helps matters. Now, any Harrer claim of transformation under the Dalai Lama's tutelage is unlikely to pass public muster; call it "QBVII II." If the problem snowballs larger toward release date, look for distributor leadership.

Rocket Man

When a member of the first manned mission to Mars is injured during training, NASA must call in the only possible replacement, Fred Randall (Harland Williams), who for a rocket scientist is no rocket scientist. Chaos ensues as the team heads to Mars in this family comedy. Jessica Lundy ("The Stupids"), William Sadler ("Solo"), Shelley Duvall and Beau Bridges co-star. Stuart Gillard ("Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles III") directs; Craig Mazin and Greg Erb script; Roger Birnbaum produces for Caravan. (Buena Vista, 10/10 wide)

Exploitips: If "G.I. Jane" performs, exhibitors might look more kindly on booking a film made by Caravan (parent of such duds as "Gone Fishin'," "Celtic Pride" and "The Rich Man's Wife"). Even if that Demi Moore starrer doesn't prevail, "Rocket Man" still has one plus, in that it rules the studio family-film roost until 10/24's "FairyTale." Although the Mars Pathfinder mania is a bit dated, a comic link to that popular event should help. Catchline: "Remember the Mars Pathfinder mission, when most everything went right? Now comes 'Rocket Man,' where everything goes wrong."

Gang Related

Aka "Criminal Intent," this police drama follows detectives ("Race the Sun's" James Belushi and "Gridlock'd's" Tupac Shakur, in his last role before his murder) who've framed gang members to hide their own drug crimes but now must set up an undercover DEA agent. Lela Rochon ("The Chamber") and Dennis Quaid also star. Jim Kouf (who wrote "Operation Dumbo Drop" and the "Stakeout" series) directs and scripts. (Orion, 10/10)

Exploitips: Expect urban and male-demo support in some numbers. Shakur's previous, the Jan. '97 "Gridlock'd," pulled just $5.5 million despite good reviews and the fact that his death was then recent, and Belushi isn't the draw he was in the late '80s. The drug theme also has fallen into theatrical disfavor, though it remains a small-screen staple.

Napolean

This live-action film tracks the adventures of a golden retriever puppy (voiced by "The Doctor's" Adam Wylie) that slips into a hot-air balloon and is carried to Australia's wilds. Bronson Pinchot, Wendy Makkena and David Ogden Stiers also voice. Mario Andreacchio directs, scripts (with Mark Saltzman and producer Michael Bourchier) and produces. (Goldwyn, 10/10)

Exploitips: Any live-action animal film must compete in audience minds with the lipsynched "Babe." This film, two years on the Goldwyn slate, is of the older variety. Still, one can expect that a Goldwyn children's film would be different than a Disney children's film; if so, critical response could help. But "Napolean," newly moved from 8/8 in MGM's new slating of its MGM/UA/Orion/Goldwyn movies, now goes up against that king of kids, Disney, and its "Rocket Man."

The House of Yes

When Marty ("Kicking and Screaming's" Josh Hamilton) returns for his family's Thanksgiving dinner, he brings his new fiancee (Tori Spelling of TV's "Beverly Hills, 90210"). When the electricity fails, the clan's dysfunctions take turns for the worse. Parker Posey and Genevieve Bujold co-star. Mark Waters directs and adapts Wendy MacLeod's black-comedy play; both of "johns," Beau Flynn and Stefan Simchowitz produce. (Miramax, 10/10 NY/LA)

Exploitips: In a 3 1/2-star review, our Sundance critic said this "nefarious tale" of "family secrets and closet skeletons" is both "blisteringly funny" and "horrifyingly tragic." Art-house exhibitors should highlight the comedy to differentiate this from the more dramatic "Gang Related" and "Deep Crimson." Catchline: "Car wrecks...tabloid TV... and now a family reunion. You want to look away, but you can't. Enter 'The House of Yes.'"

Deep Crimson

In this Mexican/French/Spanish co-production, an aging mother (Regina Orozco) abandons home and children to join with a handsome philanderer (Daniel Gimenez Cacho) on a crime spree. Marisa Paredes co-stars. Arturo Ripstein ("The Queen of the Night") directs; Paz Alicia Garciadiego scripts; Miguel Necoechea and Paolo Barbachano produce. (New Yorker, 10/8 NY)

Exploitips: Moved from 6/20, the Spanish-language "Deep Crimson" won a four-star review from our Toronto fest critic, who called this "a lively and daring satirical horror/romance" and says Ripstein, a former assistant to filmmaker Luis Bunuel, "shows some of Bunuel's talent for mixing a sacrilegious sense of humor with prankish horror." Call this a "Scream" for the art-house set.

Parallel Sons

An unlikely bond grows between a rural white teenager (Gabriel Mick) and an escaped urban-black convict (Laurence Mason). Murphy Guyer, Graham Alex Johnson, Heather Gottlieb and Josh Hopkins co-star. John G. Young directs and scripts; James Spione and Nancy Larson produce. (Greycat, 10/10 NY)

Exploitips: Another much-moved film (Cinevista first planned a March '96 bow, then Greycat acquired it and targeted June and then November of last year), "Parallel Sons" might be most effectively marketed to gay audiences through alternative media.

OCTOBER 17

Playing God

A surgeon ("Kalifornia's" David Duchovny) is disbarred for operating while high. Hired by a criminal ("Beautiful Girls'" Timothy Hutton) as his "gunshot doctor"—to treat associates who can't visit a hospital—the doctor falls for the crook's moll ("Foxfire's" Angelina Jolie) and must decide whether to continue his new life or go straight. Andy Wilson directs; Mark Haskell Smith scripts; Marc Abraham ("Sugar Hill") and Laura Bickford produce for Touchstone. (Buena Vista, 10/17 wide)

Exploitips: Buena Vista flirted with releasing this in mid-May, when it would have battled the similar-demo Andy Garcia starrer "Night Falls on Manhattan." The talented Duchovny is a small-screen icon thanks to Fox TV's "The X-Files," but just as his wattage wouldn't have outshown Garcia's then it won't dim Pacino and Reeves' now. Unless Buena Vista moves it again, it seems ordained that "Playing God" won't cast down "Devil's Advocate"—especially with Duchovny's many SF fans opting for "Dark Empire" or...

Gattaca

In a future in which genetic engineering is a prosperous and competitive business, a young man ("Before Sunrise's" Ethan Hawke) who is predestined to die in his early 30s strives to change his fate. Originally titled "The Eighth Day," this science-fiction film also stars Uma Thurman ("Batman & Robin") and Alan Arkin ("Mother Night"). Andrew Niccol (scripter on Paramount's coming "The Truman Show") makes his directing debut; the "Matilda" trio of Danny DeVito, Stacey Sher and Michael Shamberg produce for their Jersey Films. (Columbia, 10/17 wide)

Exploitips: "Gattaca" had been penciled for March, but the studio had the Ford-Pitt "The Devil's Own." Now this goes against Pacino-Reeves, another unhappy prospect. Still, one might expect part of the twenty- and thirtysomething crowd (Hawke and Thurman's strong suits) to prefer two young actors to one young and one old. And an SF entry usually performs well for at least the first weekend, when genre fans turn out in abundance. But which they might do for...

Devil's Advocate

Keanu Reeves stars as young, ambitious attorney Kevin Lomax, who joins a powerful New York law firm headed by the mysterious and charismatic John Milton (Al Pacino). As Lomax is seduced by success, power and money, he realizes that his colleagues' abilities are somewhat more—or less—than human. Charlize Theron ("Trial and Error"), Judith Ivey ("There Goes the Neighborhood"), Craig T. Nelson ("I'm Not Rappaport"), Ruben Santiago-Hudson, Jeffrey Jones and Delroy Lindo (also "A Life Less Ordinary") co-star. Taylor Hackford ("Dolores Claiborne") directs; Jonathan Lemkin ("Demolition Man") and Tony Gilroy ("The Cutting Edge") script; Arnon Milchan ("A Time to Kill"), Anne Kopelson and Arnold Kopelson ("Eraser") produce for Kopelson Prods. (Warner, 10/17)

Exploitips: With John Milton as a character, who might "Devil's Advocate" toll for? It could toll for thee, as exhibitors booking it expect the month's only pairing of superstars to outpace all comers. Part "The Firm," part "Dr. Faustus," the film reportedly doesn't emphasize the diabolic, so this will likely remain in the horror-tinged mainstream in which Hackford's "Dolores Claiborne" found critical, if not as much audience ($25 mil.), success—of course without those superstars.

Dark Empire

Originally "Dark City" and a Fox project, this futuristic thriller stars Rufus Sewell ("Cold Comfort Farm") as a man who discovers he's wanted for murders he can't remember. He soon learns that his memories and his life as he knows it (and those of other people's) are artificial creations. William Hurt, Kiefer Sutherland and Jennifer Connelly also star. Alex Proyas ("The Crow") directs, and he scripts with Lem Dobbs ("Kafka") and David Goyer ("The Crow: City of Angels"); Andrew Mason produces. (New Line, 10/17 wide)

Exploitips: The SF crowd is dependable and (for a sub-demo) big, but not big enough to support two wide releases on the same weekend. Expect this or "Gattaca" to move again ("Dark Empire" moved from September to August to here). If not, although one can't discount "Gattaca's" star advantage and datenight-friendly male/female teaming, the "Dark Empire" makers' various "Crow" credits could lend this greater genre authenticity.

Bean

British TV comedy-series superstar Rowan Atkinson brings his Bean character to the bigscreen in this screwball comedy. Mr. Bean is a ne'er-do-well employee of a London museum; to get rid of him, his associates pass him off as an art expert to accompany the masterpiece "Whistler's Mother" to an L.A. gallery. Peter MacNicol and Harris Yulin (both "Ghostbusters II"), Pamela Reed ("Kindergarten Cop") and Burt Reynolds co-star. Mel Smith ("The Tall Guy") directs; Richard Curtis and Rowan Atkinson (both also "The Tall Guy") script with Robin Driscoll; "French Kiss" duo Tim Bevan and Eric Fellner produce for their Working Title label with Peter Bennett-Jones. (Gramercy, 10/17 wide)

Exploitips: Like a Jackie Chan of comedy—world-famous elsewhere, virtually unknown stateside—Atkinson wins a 3 1/2-star review (see this issue) that calls "Bean" "an incredibly entertaining piece of comic mayhem." U.S. fans of his PBS series are likely ticketbuyers; to pull neophytes (an early poster with Bean stealing an O from the Hollywood sign should grab comic audiences), highlight the hijinks. Stage a Bean or Whistler's Mother lookalike contest—or go for media attention with a charity Whistler's Mother dunking throw. Some art-house support could be siphoned by Fox Searchlight's expanding "The Ice Storm," though it's a drama (see August-issue Trailers).

Lilies

In this tale of love, betrayal and revenge, a Catholic bishop is locked in a prison and forced to watch the inmates stage a recreation of the four-decade-old events of a gay love triangle involving both the bishop and a confessor. Brent Carver, Marcel Sabourin and Aubert Pallascio star. John Greyson ("Zero Patience") directs; Michael Marc Bouchard adapts his play; Anna Stratton, Robin Cass and Arnie Gelbart produce. (Turbulent Arts, 10/17 NY, 10/24 LA)

Exploitips: In a one-star review, our Sundance critic (April '97) called this Greyson's "most beautifully crafted movie" but added it was "pretty silly," using "all the same cliches that haunt purple melodramas of heterosexual love." Still, "Lilies" citably won the audience

LATE MOVIE MOVES...

NIGHTWATCH

In this Dimension suspenser, a law student ("Trainspotting's" Ewan McGregor) part-timing as a morgue night watchman is suspected of serial killings. Nick Nolte and Patricia Arquette also star. Director Ole Bornedal remakes his Danish-language original via a script by Steven Soderbergh; Michael Obel produces. (Miramax, 9/12)

Exploitips: First set 10/25 and 11/22 of '96 and then for this past February and then summer, "Nightwatch" now has only the Steven Seagal starrer "Fire Down Below" as same-date demo competition.

SEVEN NOTES IN BLACK

This re-release of the late '70s Italian thriller "Sette Note in Nero" (aka "The Psychic") stars Jennifer O'Neill. (Miramax, 9/19 NY/LA)

Exploitips: This faces no genre or foreign-language competition, though it does battle art-housers "The Myth of Fingerprints," "Going All the Way," "Wide Awake" and...

THE DISAPPEARANCE OF GARCIA LORCA

A Spanish writer (Esai Morales) uncovers the killer of poet/playwright Lorca (Andy Garcia). (Sony Releasing, 9/19 NY/LA)

Exploitips: See our review in this issue.

THE LONG WAY HOME

This Mark Jonathan Harris documentary focuses on the post-WWII plight of Jewish refugees. Rabbi Marvin Hier and Richard Trank produce. (Seventh Art, 9/19 NY/LA)

Exploitips: See our review in this issue.

MON HOMME

A French hooker recruits a pimp. Anouk Grinberg stars. Bertrand Blier directs and scripts. (Artificial Eye, Sept. undated)

Exploitips: See our three-star review (3/97).

I WAS A JEWISH SEX WORKER

Filmmaker Phillip B. Roth recounts his efforts to reconcile his family and his homosexuality. (Greycat, 9/1 LA)

Exploitips: See our 4/97 2 1/2-star review.

MARY JANE'S NOT A VIRGIN ANYMORE

A nerdy girl tries to be as hip as her older coworkers. Sara Jacobson directs, scripts and produces. (Movieworld, Sept. undated)

Exploitips: The title should attract gals out on the town together, though the sex could pull males usually resistant to female stories.

WITHNAIL & I

This re-release of the 1987 British comedy concerns two self-absorbed, unemployed actors who endure a disastrous vacation in the country. Richard E. Grant, Paul McGann and Richard Griffiths star. Bruce Robinson directs. (Northern Arts, Sept. undated)

Exploitips: Emphasize the film's 10-year anniversary to lend this event status.

Best Canadian Film Award at the Montreal fest and four Genies (Canadian Oscars).

Eye of God

In an Okie oil town, a woman marries a prison pen pal, only to learn he was in the slammer for brutally beating a woman. Martha Plimpton ("I'm Not Rappaport"), Kevin Anderson ("A Thousand Acres") and Hal Holbrook star in a tale of love, murder and fundamentalism. Tim Blake Nelson helms and adapts his play; Wendy Ettinger and Michael Nelson produce. (Castle Hill, 10/17 NY, 10/31 LA)

Exploitips: Moved from September, "Eye of God" is the latest from an expanding Castle Hill. Look for positive East Coast notices to support later openings; midwestern small-town runs could also work with this.

OCTOBER 24

A Life Less Ordinary

From the "Trainspotting"/"Shallow Grave" team comes this $12 million project about a spoiled girl ("My Best Friend's Wedding's" Cameron Diaz) who is kidnapped by a janitor at her father's company. Dad sends two hit men—actually angels—to rescue her and dispose of the kidnapper. Ewan McGregor (also "Trainspotting") co-stars with Holly Hunter and Delroy Lindo. Danny Boyle directs; John Hodge scripts; Andrew MacDonald produces for their Figment Films. (Fox, 10/24)

Exploitips: This is the weekend's cool flick to see, so twentysomething response should be high. Expect critical interest also to be high, meaning gleanable quotes to draw the older crowd who might have missed the filmmakers' previous bigscreen efforts. Fox thought enough of this one's prospects going in to also acquire almost all world rights.

I Know What You Did Last Summer

This psychological thriller stars Jennifer Love Hewitt ("Sister Act II"), Sarah Michelle Gellar (TV's "Buffy the Vampire Slayer"), Ryan Phillippe ("nowhere") and Freddie Prinze Jr. (also in "The House of Yes") as four friends who made a desperate pact to conceal a shocking secret but now discover that someone else knows it. Anne Heche ("Volcano") and Bridgette Wilson ("Mortal Kombat") co-star. Jim Gillespie directs; Kevin Williamson ("Scream") adapts a Lois Duncan novel; Neal Moritz (also "Volcano"), Stokely Chaffin and Eric Feig produce. (Columbia, 10/24 wide)

Exploitips: Similar in demo to "A Life Less Ordinary," this has as its most salable element the Williamson "Scream" credit, though actress Gellar's new small-screen popularity should also be a positive factor. A shorter title (like "Dark Summer") would avoid images of school essays instead of scares.

FairyTale: A True Story

Set in 1917, this drama pits good friends Sir Arthur Conan Doyle (Peter O'Toole, also in "Phantoms") against magician Harry Houdini (Harvey Keitel) in a debate over the authenticity of photographs taken by two young girls that could prove the existence of fairies. Florence Hoath, Elizabeth Earl, Paul McGann and Phoebe Nicholls also star. Charles Sturridge ("Where Angels Fear to Tread") directs; Ernie Contreras scripts; Wendy Finerman ("Forrest Gump") and Bruce Davey produce for Icon. See photo on P. 22. (Paramount, 10/24 wide)

Exploitips: O'Toole and Keitel's are the star names, but their parts are supporting; the real story concerns the two girls. For the most part, this is superb filmmaking—why, it's just as good as "A Little Princess"! And that's the fear: That a fine family film, made in an era when social groups are calling for fine family films, could tank. "FairyTale" also has the non-Disney, girl-lead and period-film negatives. So emphasize the O'Toole and Keitel names to give this a chance to build in the marketplace.

Phantoms

This Dimension supernatural thriller tells the story of a female doctor who finds all but four people in her small Colorado town killed by an evil force. Joanna Going ("Little City"), Liev Schreiber ("The Daytrippers"), Peter O'Toole, Rose McGowan ("Scream") and Ben Affleck ("Chasing Amy") star. Joe Chapelle directs; Dean Koontz adapts his novel with Joel Soisson, who produces with his "Infinity" partner Mike Leahy and with Steve Lane and Bob Pringle. (Miramax, 10/24 wide)

Exploitips: This month's earlier "Wishmaster" and "An American Werewolf in Paris" might sate mainstream chiller interest, and 10/24's "I Know What You Did Last Summer" might grab some of the "boo!" crowd that regularly puts $10 million into opening-week coffers for such fare. But "Phantoms" can be touted as "from frightmeister Dean Koontz and the company that brought you 'Scream'," and the timing is perfect for Halloween.

Chairman of the Board

The frenetic red-headed comedian Carrot Top plays a goofy inventor/surfer who helps a man who turns out to be a wealthy entrepreneur. When the businessman dies two weeks later and wills Carrot Top his company, corporate chaos ensues. (Trimark, 10/24 wide)

Exploitips: Part "Heaven Can Wait" (1978), part "Melvin (and Howard)," this latest wide release from Trimark goes after the MTV crowd the distributor targeted for "Meet Wally Sparks," which resulted in a multimillion-dollar writeoff. Perhaps the young Carrot Top will connect where the septuagenarian Rodney Dangerfield didn't, as he's a campus favorite. To help, draw public (and media) attention by accoutering staff in Carrot Top wiggery.

Hurricane Streets

Aka "Hurricane," this drama follows lower Manhattan boys who do small-time crime. Brendan Sexton III ("Welcome to the Dollhouse") stars as a 15-year-old living with his grandmother while his mother is in prison; he falls for a young Latina, who has an overprotective father, and dreams of escaping his world of despair. Isidra Vega, Jared Harris ("I Shot Andy Warhol") and L.M. Kit Carson ("Running on Empty") co-star; Morgan J. Freeman directs and scripts, and he produces with Galt Niederhoffer and Gill Holland. See our Sneak Preview in this issue. (UA, 10/24)

Exploitips: This garnered three Sundance awards: best director, best cinematography, and audience. Our reviewer gave it three stars, calling it "a boy's coming-of-age story on the order of '400 Blows'" and crediting Sexton with "a powerful authenticity that shines through in a complex performance." Freeman tells BOXOFFICE he wants to see this at New York's Angelika, and indeed "Hurricane Streets" will likely play best at such art-house venues, though its "Romeo and Juliet" element could draw mainstream youths.

Swept From the Sea

Aka "Amy Foster" and "To Love and Be Loved," this romantic drama is adapted from a Joseph Conrad novella. Vincent Perez ("The Crow: City of Angels") stars as a Ukrainian emigrant trapped in England who falls for a young woman ("Chain Reaction's" Rachel Weisz) and is helped by a local doctor ("Richard III's" Ian McKellen). Kathy Bates ("Dolores Claiborne") co-stars. Beeban Kidron ("To Wong Foo, Thanks for Everything, Julie Newmar") directs; Tim Willocks scripts; Polly Tapson, Charles Steel and Beeban Kidron produce for Phoenix. (TriStar, 10/24 ltd)

Exploitips: If lacking A-list stars, this has the feel of a prestige production (TriStar is billing it as an "epic drama"); its best demo is literate females who like a romantic story and would know the Conrad name. A bookstore tie-in thus would help this one not be a "Foster" freeze, and the platformed release could let word-of-mouth build wider interest.

Deconstructing Harry

In this Woody Allen comedy set in New York (now there's a change), Kirstie Alley, Richard Benjamin, Billy Crystal, Judy Davis ("Husbands and Wives"), Mariel Hemingway ("Manhattan"), Amy Irving, Julie Kavner ("Shadows and Fog"), Julia Louis-Dreyfus, Demi Moore, Elisabeth Shue, Stanley Tucci and Robin Williams star along with the Woodman, who plays a writer experiencing erotic-life turmoil (now there's a change). Allen directs and scripts; Jean Doumanian produces. (Fine Line, 10/24 NY/LA, 10/31 exp)

Exploitips: Although Miramax handled Allen's last three films, Fine Line acquired North American rights to this at Cannes, with part of the $10.5 million pact being that the distributor would release Barbara Kopple's documentary about Allen's jazz band's European tour. In the '90s, Allen's seven films have averaged just $8.75 million domestically, but Fine Line is likely to toil extra hard here.

The Twilight of the Golds

In this drama, pregnant mother Suzanne (Jennifer Beals), father Rob (John Tenney), grandparents-to-be Walter (Garry Marshall) and Phyllis (Faye Dunaway) and brother David (Brendan Fraser) learn the son Suzanne is carrying has a gene present in almost all gay men. Though the liberal folks have adjusted to David's homosexuality, the news throws all into turmoil. Ross Marks ("Homage") directs; apparent H.L. Mencken fan Jonathan Tolins and Seth Bass adapt Tolins' play. (CFP, 10/24)

Exploitips: Although "The Twilight of the Golds" isn't a studio release, the subject matter could generate extra media attention, and both heterosexual and homosexual audiences could find this a specialized draw.

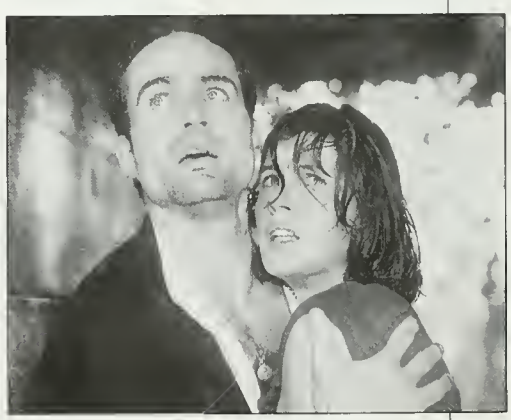
Eve's Bayou



A 10-year-old tells the tale of her eccentric family in Louisiana in this drama. Samuel L. Jackson ("A Time to Kill") and Lynn Whitfield ("A Thin Line Between Love and Hate") star. Actress Kasi Lemmons ("Fear of a Black Hat") directs and scripts; Samuel L. Jackson produces with Caldecot Chubb ("The Crow"). (Trimark, 10/24 NY/LA, 11/7 exp)

Exploitips: Although with "Meet Wally Sparks" and "Chairman of the Board" it's now a wide-release player, Trimark continues to handle specialized fare, and this one sounds promising. Expect the Jackson and Whitfield names to attract black auds, and (rating allowing) even urban families might give this a try.

OCTOBER 31

Incognito

An art forger decides to make one final copy and then go straight. When his associates frame him for stealing the "original" artwork, he must flee for his life. Jason Patric ("Speed 2:

Cruise Control"), Irene Jacob ("Othello") and Rod Steiger star. John Badham directs; Jeannie Dominy (Warner's coming "Courtesan") scripts; Morgan Creek's James G. Robinson produces. (Warner Bros., 10/31 wide)

Exploitips: "Incognito" has better ticket potential than last Halloween's Morgan Creek effort, "Bad Moon." Still, though it's a genre Morgan Creek likes ("White Sands," "Trial by Jury," "Diabolique"), it's one it hasn't cracked. Despite recent casting missteps, Patric and Jacob can deliver onscreen; the question is, can Badham? His 11/95 "Nick of Time" grossed barely $8 million, and his four films before that averaged just $26 million. Key plus: This is the date's only studio opener.

OCTOBER UNDATED

Critical Care

In this satirical drama, director Sidney Lumet ("Night Falls on Manhattan") takes a darkly comic look at the state of the health-care industry. James Spader, Kyra Sedgwick, Helen Mirren, Anne Bancroft and Albert Brooks star. Steven Schwartz scripts, and he produces with Lumet. (Live, Oct. wide undated)

Exploitips: New distributor Live has advanced this from November, perhaps a good move to avoid the holiday crush. The cast is promising and should attract audience interest; given Lumet's recent track record—his four films in the '90s have averaged only a $14 million gross—highlight the Spader and Brooks names and this release's audience-friendly comedic underpinnings.

Year of the Horse

This rockumentary chronicles the life and music of rocker Neil Young and his band, Crazy Horse. Live performances, behind-the-scenes footage and interviews from 1996's Europe and U.S. tour are featured. Jim Jarmusch ("Dead Man") directs; L.A. Johnson produces. (October Films, Oct. undated)

Exploitips: New Universal subsidiary October acquired worldwide rights to this at Cannes and plans to show the film at several fests before it opens in theatres. That exploitable strategy gives stateside reviewers time to come on board, so look for positive notices. To pull Young fans, hold a drawing for a set of Young's recordings with Crazy Horse.

Tokyo Fist

In this sweaty and kinetic Japanese-language actioner, a corporate executive ("Tetsuo: The Ironman" filmmaker Shinya Tsukamoto, who also directs here) is unhappy to meet up with an old school friend (Kohji Tsukamoto), now a boxer. Their competitive jealousies increase when the exec's fiancee (Kahora Fujii) decides to move in with the pugilist. (Manga, Oct. undated)

Exploitips: This played the '95 Toronto fest, meaning no one picked it up for two years. But Manga specializes in the genre it's named for: Its first, "Ghost in the Shell," grossed $500,000 in a 15-print run. Quotably, Tsukamoto has been called "the Asian answer to William Gibson, William Burroughs, David Cronenberg and David Lynch," and "Tokyo Fist" has been described as "an assault and battery of a movie."

Nueba Yol II

In this Spanish-language continuation of the adventures of a Dominican man in America begun in "Nueba Yol," Balbuena has an obligation to remain in New York but knows a new immigration statute will become law on April 4, 1997. This comedy/drama deals with his efforts to become "legal" before that date. Actor Luisito Marti and writer/director/producer Angel Muniz return. (Kit Parker, Oct. undated)

Exploitips: Released last year in the Dominican Republic, where the character of Balbuena is a TV favorite, "Nueba Yol" had a strong response—repeated in its New York opening and later U.S. rollout. Expect similar or even better numbers at least initially here from the underserved Hispanic audience.

David Searching

In this comedy, David (Anthony Rapp) and Gwen (Camryn Manheim) are roommates, best friends and both searching for the perfect man. After a series of comically bad dates, David spots and pursues his ideal man only to end up with a big dose of reality. Leslie L. Smith directs and scripts; Smith produces with John P. Scholz. (Greycat, Oct. undated)

Exploitips: This gay variant on the "If Lucy Fell"/"My Best Friend's Wedding" narrative could perform with gay audiences, but at least one Sydney gay fest review forecasts crossover business, especially of the distaff demo.

Midaq Alley

Based on the Egyptian novel by Nobel winner Naguib Mahfouz, "Midaq Alley" moves the action from 1940s Cairo to modern Mexico City. This Mexican drama blends the stories of three characters on the same day: middle-aged family man Rutilio (Ernesto Gomez Cruż) who experiences first-time homosexual feelings that lead to domestic disaster; beautiful Alma ("Fools Rush In's" Salma Hayek) whose paramour goes off to America to make enough money to wed her; and a spinster landlady, Susanita (Margarita Sanz), who dreams of marriage. A final section picks up the stories two years later. Jorge Fons directs; Vincente Lenero scripts; Alfredo Ripstein Jr. produces. (Northern Arts, Oct. undated)

Exploitips: The film's anthology nature and Egyptian heritage make it a specialized specialized film—but that's Northern Arts' specialty. Mahfouz's Nobel win is more citable for art-house auds than is the Hayek credit, though her presence sure can't hurt.

FOLLOW THE LEDER

TV Veteran Mimi Leder Helms Her — and DreamWorks'—Film Debut

by Wade Major

FIRSTBORN: Debut director Mimi Leder (right) with actor George Clooney on the set of DreamWorks SKG's first release, "The Peacemaker."

Why are you offering me an action movie?" Mimi Leder recalls asking Steven Spielberg. "What makes you think I can direct action?" Said Spielberg, "You're directing action every day on 'ER.'"

It's hard to imagine Mimi Leder, having helmed and produced some of TV's most honored shows (including that current NBC hit), being apprehensive about making the jump to films. Then again, "The Peacemaker" is no ordinary feature.

As the first release from DreamWorks SKG, the much-hyped fledgling studio created two years ago by Spielberg, Jeffrey Katzenberg and David Geffen, the film will be heavily scrutinized as an indicator of SKG slate strength. Even seasoned directors would likely shudder at the thought of carrying such a mantle, which is precisely why Leder simply chose not to think about it.

"When I took the film," she says, "I couldn't walk into it saying, 'I have all this pressure on my shoulders: It's the first DreamWorks movie, it's my first feature.' I just had to do it scene by scene, shot by shot."

As it was, Leder was busy enough managing the film's epic and international scale. A high-tech political action/thriller centering on hijacked Russian nuclear warheads, the September 26 release stars George Clooney ("Batman & Robin," "ER") as Col. Thomas Devoe, a devil-may-care intelligence expert who must track down and recover the weapons. Along on the ride, and to keep Devoe in check, is Nicole Kidman ("The Portrait of a Lady") as Dr. Julia Kelly, head of a White House nuclear anti-smuggling group. In their mad scramble to forestall global catastrophe, Devoe and Kelly trek from America to Austria to Russia to Iran to Bosnia and back to the U.S.

"I think people are very shocked to find out a woman directed this movie," Leder says. "But, thanks to people like Steven Spielberg and ["ER" producer] John Wells, who just hire good directors whether they're women or men, those stereotypes are changing. I know I've done my job when nobody knows the sex of the director."

Although Leder's talent for directing might not necessarily divulge her gender, it does suggest that there's something in the blood. The daughter of late independent filmmaker Paul Leder, she admits that she was literally raised on a movie set, acquiring an early love for the medium that led to her becoming the first woman ever accepted into the American Film Institute's cinematography program. Work as a script supervisor on "Hill Street Blues" followed, after which she segued into directing with acclaimed series like "Crime Story" and "L.A. Law." But it was with "China Beach" that Leder's stock really took off. As one of the show's producers and a regular director, she had her first two Emmy nominations. And then came "ER."

Resisting the trend of outlandish one-upmanship that has driven action/thrillers into the realm of the absurd, Leder and screenwriter Michael Schiffer ("Crimson Tide") sought to keep "The Peacemaker" firmly grounded in credible reality, adhering as closely as possible to an original treatment by husband-and-wife journalists and defense experts Andrew and Leslie Cockburn. "We were very aware of the fact that we were not trying to do the conventional action movie," Leder says. "What I tried to do was very much go against the grain and make it an honest portrayal of these circumstances so that audiences will hopefully be asking themselves, 'If we were in that situation, what would we do?'"

> "I couldn't walk into it saying, 'I have all this pressure on my shoulders: It's the first DreamWorks movie, it's my first feature.' I just had to do it scene by scene."

Maintaining such a high level of emotional realism meant taking dramatic risks; most notable is the inclusion of a sympathetic antagonist, a Bosnian diplomat played by Romanian actor Marcel Iures. "You can't hate him," Leder says. "I think that moral ambiguity is what attracted me to the script and to his character."

Leder offers nothing but praise for her cast. "Ironically, George was attached to the project first," she adds of the coincidence of working with her "ER" star on her first feature. "It was very fortuitous," Leder says, "because we do have an unspoken rapport."

Such rapport came in handy. "Hanging off a train in the middle of Slovakia near the Polish border was quite memorable," she laughs. "But it was an even harder film to do emotionally because my father died right before I started shooting." Fortunately, Leder found comfort in the cooperation and professionalism of her international crew, an experience that proved "fortifying," she says. "Film has only one language."

DreamWorks has signed Leder for two more films. She's now making "Deep Impact," a DreamWorks/Paramount co-venture loosely based on "When Worlds Collide." It's the project after that, however, that strikes closest to home for her. Based on a script by her father, the World War II-era "Sentimental Journey" will tell the story of how Leder's father, a soldier in Patton's army, met her mother, an Auschwitz survivor. Leder's sister Geraldine is casting; brother Reuben is rewriting. "My father was going to direct the movie, but he never got the chance. So we feel it is our duty and obligation to bring their story to the screen."

All of which begs the inevitable question: What next? "A vacation!" Leder says, laughing. "And time with my daughter and husband. Because I am a mother and a wife as well." She pauses, then adds with a hint of satisfaction, "It's exhausting being me."

"The Peacemaker." Starring George Clooney, Nicole Kidman and Marcel Iures. Directed by Mimi Leder. Written by Michael Schiffer. Produced by Walter Parkes and Branko Lustig. A DreamWorks SKG release. Action/thriller. Opens Sept. 26.

LIKE A "HURRICANE"

Indie Filmmaker Morgan J. Freeman Experiences a Rising Studio Barometer

by Alex Albanese

Relaxing amid the battered couches and caffeine vibe of an Avenue A hangout on the summer's first hot day in New York, Morgan J. Freeman has reached a heady point in his life. Freeman (no relation to the actor) is a young independent filmmaker whose first feature, "Hurricane," won three prizes at Sundance, including a best director nod, and was acquired soon after by MGM for its United Artists banner. Retitled "Hurricane Streets," the drama is set to bow mid-October.

Growing up in Long Beach, Calif., Freeman and friends "messed around" with video cameras for a ninth-grade assignment on Homer's "The Odyssey." The result, Freeman says, was "a cheesy video with everybody in togas basically just reading lines, but we thought we were making a movie." That led to "episodes" of "Miami Vice" with neighborhood car chases and Pillsbury flour stunt-doubling as cocaine. "But it never dawned on us that people did this professionally. I never thought about being a filmmaker."

During Freeman's days at the University of California, Santa Barbara, the then-biology major stumbled across a film studies course. It proved an epiphany. "I realized there were more possibilities than just doctor/lawyer/engineer," he says. Freeman graduated in 1992 with a film degree. A year in Paris to study film criticism followed, during which he also did low-budget film work and directed two shorts. Returning to America, he entered New York University's graduate program.

"At UCSB, Gregg Araki had made two $5,000 features a few years before, which inspired some other people to make films with $15,000 budgets while I was there. Later, when I came to New York, people talked about how difficult it was to make a movie, that you needed a million dollars and this and that—$1.3 million seemed to be the number. Well, because of my experiences at UCSB, I knew it didn't have to be that expensive if you have people that really want to do it. That ultra-low budget knowledge was incredibly important. Otherwise, I would have believed them, and 'Hurricane' never would have happened."

Two crucial elements in the film's making hearken back to his year abroad. The work Freeman did for Paris' Why Not Productions led to a New York film internship, and that in turn led to pre-production and second assistant director work on a low-budget feature called "Middle Child." Befriending several actors on the shoot, Freeman cast them in a short. He then began work on a second short script, tailored for Brendan Sexton III, the actor he'd enjoyed working with most.

While that script was growing into the feature-length draft of "Hurricane," "Middle Child's" title was changed to "Welcome to the Dollhouse." When it won the top prize at the '96 Sundance fest and was acquired by Sony Classics, Sexton became a commodity. Then the fates smiled again: After finishing his script, Freeman ran into a friend from Paris who invited him to a script reading. There, Freeman met producer Gill Holland, who had already seen "Welcome to the Dollhouse" in Toronto.

"I passed my script off to him, and he liked it. He knew some people who had financing who also loved Brendan's work in 'Dollhouse.' 'Hurricane' was never sent out to anybody to be made. I gave the script to only one person, and he got it financed. It was truly something that came from my head, straight onto the page, that actually rolled into getting financing and was made without ever being altered to get it made. Cast control, script control, crew control were all ours."

Money, always tight during the 30-day shoot, ebbed and flowed, but Freeman's 40-person crew stayed loyal. "It was never, 'Pay me or I'm gone,'" he says, "even if the checks weren't on time. The crew always worked and acted as if they were paying their bills and had money in their pockets from this, and there's no way anybody could have. I know, because I did it on 'Dollhouse.' I knew how tough it was. It's nice now," he adds, "to see ["Hurricane Streets"] pay off for many of them. People are getting jobs. The awards helped everybody."

Those Sundance honors included best cinematography and a shared audience award. Freeman describes the fest as "the worst and then the best experience of my life. I was terrified. The first screening was like drug withdrawal—all I did was shake, sweat and freak out. But there was a really good reaction from the audience." No distributor deal was struck until after the closing awards night, however, and during the fest's run he realized "lots of independent films made this year aren't going to come out. You always think it's going to happen for you, but what if it doesn't?"

Those worries evaporated with the awards. MGM had expressed interest during the fest, even though studio executives down in L.A. had been shown, due to screening-room error, the first 10 minutes of the 1977 Dino De Laurentiis "Hurricane." Yet an agreement was soon reached—and with it went Freeman's much-valued control. "It's suddenly different—now it's a business deal. The film's final cut, marketing, image, even my image to a certain extent, are all in their hands now. I just need to step back a bit, trust, and hope people respond well."

Freeman is fully aware that moviegoer reaction to "Hurricane Streets" will factor into how much control he has on his next project. But, right now, he's most eager to "walk down to the Angelika past a 'Hurricane' poster, buy a ticket, and see the film with a paying audience." Soon, Freeman will be doing just that.

"Lots of independent films made this year aren't going to come out. You always think it's going to happen for you, but what if it doesn't?"

"Hurricane Streets." Starring Brendan Sexton III. Directed and written by Morgan J. Freeman. Produced by Galt Niederhoffer, Gill Holland and Morgan J. Freeman. A United Artists release. Drama. Opens Oct. 10.

A TASTE OF SUCCESS

At the Franks' Drexell Theatre, Audiences Come for the Movies, but They Stay for the Food

by Susan Lambert

ART DECO DREXELL: Seven minutes from downtown Columbus, the Drexell Theatre and adjoining Radio Cafe offer an upscale version of small-town entertainment. Note the original neon marquee.

When the phone rings at the Drexell Theatre in Columbus, Ohio, it's often a customer who needs to know not only what time the movie starts, but also what soup is on and what the sandwich specials are for the day. Ever since Jeff and Kathy Frank opened the Drexell Radio Cafe as an extension to their Drexell Theatre, customers have made a night out at the Drexell a staple of their entertainment diet.

Jeff started in exhibition in the '70s running the film program at the Columbus Museum of Art and developed it into such a successful program the museum director once complained that he couldn't get in due to sell-out crowds. Jeff then moved to the historic downtown Ohio Theatre as vice president of public relations and publicity, as which he was responsible for programming the classic movies and training tour guides of the historic 3,000-seat palace.

Kathy and Jeff had met at the museum. She was in charge of the education department. When their neighborhood theatre—the 1937 Drexell—became available in 1979, the obvious thing for the Franks was to try running a theatre on their own. "We noticed it was a really unique art deco theatre that was very streamlined and well-preserved," says Jeff. "However," adds Kathy, "it was covered up in plastic flowers." The Franks did a quick cleaning and simple restoration ("We got rid of the plastic flowers") to get it as close as possible to the 1937 look. The grand re-opening of the 737-seat Drexell had everything from borrowed Ohio Theatre ushers in tuxedos to real flowers and a bona fide movie star: The Franks had arranged for Ginger Rogers to appear in person. Despite the overwhelming opening-day success, the Franks received numerous complaints, for Jeff—coming from the classic Ohio Theatre which didn't allow concessions in the historic auditorium—had determined not to serve popcorn in his theatre. "By day two," explains Jeff, "we had popcorn. And we've been popping with the same vintage popcorn machine ever since." The Franks had learned a valuable—and exploitable—lesson: For most folks, a cinema without the right concessions is like a day without sunshine. In fact, the Franks have created many collaborations between cinema and food—combining America's two greatest social loves into one creative package.

In 1990, the Franks decided to turn the Drexell into a three-screen cinema. Jeff admits they were initially reluctant to triple the Drexell. "We had a gorgeous 700-plus seat art deco historic movie theatre. The question is, 'Are you going to change it and ruin it?'" Jeff adds, "But you know it was either triple it or we weren't going to be there because the movie business had changed. We needed to play films longer. We needed to take more risks and have the ability to play many smaller films. It's hard to play independent art films in a 737-seat house."

Working with an architect, the Franks figured out how to get their extra screens and still maintain the historic ambiance of the Drexell. "You walk into our 300-seat theatre and it's the same proscenium, all the same decorations." The secret to maintaining the integrity of the main auditorium? "We just shortened it." When the space next door to the theatre became available, Jeff and Kathy faced another important decision. "The obvious thought was, 'Let's put another theatre in,'" says Jeff. "But then we kept thinking. We really needed something to make the Drexell—in the long run—unique from multi-screen theatres. What can we do?"

Kathy realized from talking with their customers that they really lacked a place to go for coffee after the movie. "There weren't any places that were open that late," says Kathy, "especially on our side of town." Kathy and Jeff, hearing the needs of their customers, opted to put in a high-quality cafe so their clients could combine eating out with going to the movies. Kathy explains, "Our space was small, so it was a bit of a trick to figure out what we can offer with a very, very small kitchen. We came up with a kind of combination of fresh salads, appetizers and then this panini grill [specialized sandwiches grilled on a distinctive Italian bread].

The Franks opened the cafe, which houses antique radios along with 1930s and '40s artifacts and pictures, in 1995 to great success. Not only did they win a local food award, but the Radio Cafe has created an opportunity to expand their special features. Kathy explains, "We started up a talk cinema series." Every third Thursday, a local professor leads discussions after a movie. "It starts in the auditorium," says Jeff, "and then adjourns to the cafe, where everyone can sit around and have—hopefully—dessert and coffee and talk about the movies." A singles group now uses the Drexell Radio Cafe and Theatre for a meeting place. "We don't encourage people after the movie to just leave," adds Jeff. "They can hang out here."

RECIPE FOR ENTERTAINMENT: Kathy and Jeff encourage customers to feast on fine films.

The Franks say the competitive Columbus metropolitan market (with about 1.4 million people) is continuously expanding. "There's not just one or two chains, but five or six chains, with more coming in. It's a challenge for us," Kathy says. But the Franks have always been up to the challenge. "Even when they opened this big 24-plex with stadium seating, it really has not affected either movie theatre," says Kathy, "because the experience that you have here is just so different from that. Our attendance has been really steady."

The Radio Cafe inspired a "Brunch with the Bard" program when they screened "Hamlet." Jeff explains, "We had a four-hour movie, so you can get only two shows a day." They wanted to try three shows on the weekend, but wondered how to get people into a theatre at 10 a.m. "Kathy said, 'Let's do a brunch at the cafe from nine to 10,'" Jeff says. It was a huge success and they plan on doing more. The Franks' own another cinema across town—the equally historical 1926 Drexell Grandview Theatre which plays host to their "CinemaFeasts" campaign: the Franks show a particularly appetizing movie and then, in cooperation with a caterer or nearby restaurant, the audience enjoys a matching gourmet meal. "We showed 'Babette's Feast' and then had a complete seven course French meal. We started with 'Big Night' and a fabulous Italian gourmet meal. We've done 'Tampopo.' Next week we're doing 'Like Water for Chocolate'—the movie and then an incredible Mexican meal: quail with rose petal sauce—and live musicians."

Jeff says the best thing about running the Drexell is the personal aspect of bringing a movie to a welcoming audience. When his schedule allows, he still introduces the Friday and Saturday night films. Jeff compares the Drexell experience to "going to a fine restaurant where the owner or maitre d' are there for you. And you can count on that." For Kathy, the addition of the Radio Cafe has only increased the theatre's appeal: "The Cafe just played up the very important social aspect of going to a movie theatre with your friends." She adds, "Certainly movies are some of the most compelling social stories about who we are and how we react and what the issues are, and they really need to be talked about. It's pretty exciting, in the talk cinema series, for example, to see people talk about them. You just see all this stuff pouring out and that's what it's about—that kind of interaction and sharing."

Jeff adds, "It really would be a shame to lose the Drexells and the Dobies [see Feb. 1996 issue] and the specialty theatres in this country to these megaplexes. I think there's a certain audience out there where the space they're sitting in—the kind of theatre it is and the people who run the theatre and the ambiance—matters as much as the movie they're watching. There's just some magic quality where the space matters." The space, and the food, maybe.

FOR YEARS, OUR PROJECTION LIGHTING HAS MADE MOVIES ENJOYABLE FOR EVERYONE.

(PROVIDED THEY'RE NOT STUCK IN THE WRONG SEAT.)

EEEH-GAAD! Here's a scary picture. Imagine the theater industry without OSRAM Xenon lamps from OSRAM SYLVANIA. Since inventing this technology over 40 years ago for theaters, no lighting company has done more to ensure their success. Today, we offer the widest range of Xenon lamps with such features as high arc stability, unsurpassed reliability, long life, and constant color properties through lamp life. And in the future, we'll continue to provide innovative, superior Xenon lamps. Call 1-800-LIGHTBULB for information. Or visit our Web site at www.sylvania.com.

XENON. A STAR FOR OVER 40 YEARS.

Every Day Millions of People Look Down on Us

Beltrac® Public Guidance Systems... Versatile, Beautiful, Adaptable.

As the premier world supplier of outstanding quality and innovative public guidance and hospitality products since 1979, we get around. In stores, theaters, banks, hotels, airports . . . just about any place where efficient guidance and direction of the public is important, you'll find people looking down on our Lavi Beltrac logo. After all, there are some pretty good reasons why Lavi is the leader in public guidance.

Versatile – Beltrac's integrated design conceals the retractable belt within the post. So there are no easily damaged parts or receptacles. Its patented 4-way post assures that one post will work for every possible configuration without costly add-ons.

Beautiful – Four metallic finishes, and a variety of Lido-Tone powder-coated post colors, combined with 15 belt colors give the designer a broad palette for any project. The 6'-8" belts provide highly visible space for printed messages or company identification and integrated sign frames complete your messaging options.

Adaptable – Beltrac portable posts offer an answer to the ever changing needs of public guidance, with wall-to-wall and post-to-post configurations. Of course, when your interior requirements call for solid brass or chrome posts with velour ropes, our Traditional line is second to none.

All systems are designed, engineered and manufactured in the United States.

For complete information about our Public Guidance Systems and other LAVI products, call us.

CinemAcoustics®
DESIGNED FOR THE MOTION PICTURE INDUSTRY
BECAUSE THE SOUND MATTERS
CA-A800™
LUCASFILM THX
Approved for use in THX Theatres.
Major Motion Picture Studios spend millions each year on Foley effects and soundtracks, so audiences have come to expect rich, high-impact sound that brings the film to life. The CA-A540™ and the CA-A800™ Cinema Power Amplifiers were designed from the ground up to deliver digital quality audio with all the emotion and impact that today's audiences demand.
CA-A540™

Response No. 114

A new Technology 6-Channel Stereo Processor for under $2000?*

The new MOD VI Cinema Stereo Processor does not fit the mold of any previous product or any competitor's product. It is revolutionary in design. It features the new, patented "Circle Surround" ™ matrix that produces 6 channels from a conventional 4-channel optical stereo or SR soundtrack. The matrix is a full DSP (Digital Signal Processing) design. Split surround sound from your analog tracks!

Another first is a processor that can be configured for full 6-channel operation, conventional 4-channel, Front/Surround or Front/Surround with split surround playback just by moving the internal jumpers. Start small and build up to a full 6-channel system without adding expensive option cards. Even the non-sync intermission music is played back in 6-channels through the DSP matrix.

A new high frequency switching power supply allows operation from any power source from 100 VAC to 250VAC without having to change anything but the power plug for your country.

The new MOD VI also includes the famous SRS sound enhancement process for both analog and digital soundtracks at no extra cost.

A 6-channel digital input accepts the DTS-6 or DA-20 digital players without modification or extra cost add-ons.

We know how to design and build low cost stereo processors like no other company. We have been doing it for almost 20 years.

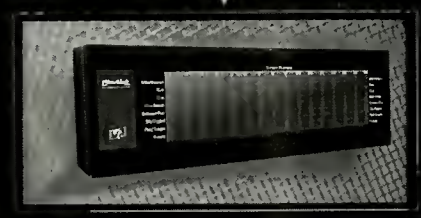
GET CONNECTED WITH THE ODYSSEY FAMILY OF PRODUCTS

Making the right connections in the theatre industry is what Odyssey does best.

Custom Sound Harnesses



CO-3 Electronic Crossover

The 3.5" Monitor (6&8 Channel)

The Digital Interface Kit

Fiber Optic Display Panel System

Infrared Sound System

We enjoy creating custom designed equipment to solve your connection needs, like the first rear wall infrared system for the hearing impaired, or the popular Digital Interface Kit introduced in 1994, the only 3.5" booth monitor, and a fiber optic status panel system.

We can save you hours of time on sound system wiring and upgrading for digital with our custom sound harnesses. They come with our guarantee of a perfect fit, and since time is money the savings can really add up.

If you have a special equipment requirement or want a feature unique to your business we can design it for you quickly and affordably.

We have, or will create the solution to keep your theatre connected and operating efficiently.

Your next widget is our next project

As I went to sit in my seat
my hands held a drink cold & sweet, but when I sat down
my face showed a frown,
cause my drink spilled all over my feet.

Since then I have been to a place that provides me a neat little space, where I can sit back
with my cup in a rack, and relax with a smile on my face.

Jim Fischer

If your theater management system gives you peace, serenity, and happiness, it must be from Mars.

If your theater management system uses the most reliable technology on Earth, it must be from MARS®. If your service calls get answered by a human being, your system must be from MARS. If you are able to close out your theater quickly each night, your system is definitely from MARS.

MARS is a system designed to run on off-the-shelf hardware while giving you the flexibility to handle all aspects of managing your theaters. From the box office to the concession stand, it allows managers to quickly perform functions so they can spend less time managing their system and more time managing their theater.

To learn more about MARS, call John Ventura at 212-450-8140.

RE: YOU GOOFED!

Dear Sir or Madam:

You goofed! Otherwise your company wouldn't be in this section, referred to in our offices as the "penalty pokey."

If you're here it means: (1) We tried to contact you more than once. (2) You failed to respond. This section is just our way of giving you a second chance.

A BUYERS DIRECTORY RESPONSE FORM is located on PAGE 6 of this issue. Fill it out and send it in today and we'll definitely contact you for next year's directory, giving your company its best opportunity to reach exhibition professionals from coast to coast. And it's all yours FOR FREE!

Or don't bother taking the measly five minutes to help us help you. We'll miss you next year, of course. But we're sure your competitors won't.

SOUND 2001: THE FUTURE IS NOW

by Mark Mayfield

One would have to be living in a cave not to be aware that these are good times in the cinema industry. For those on the equipment side, these are also very challenging times. In the particular area of cinema sound, digital technology is a major impetus behind improvements in what moviegoers actually hear at their local multiplex. The most obvious case is the increasing conversion to one or more of the three digital sound formats (Dolby SR-D, DTS and SDDS). Digital technology is now also the standard in the pre- and post-production stages of the film industry, from the recording of production dialogue on DAT machines to sound editing on digital workstations.

The one link in the audio chain that might never become digital, however, is the last link: the loudspeakers. Because human hearing depends on being in the path of moving air molecules (sound waves), we still need to create that air movement in order to make sound. This is necessarily a physical/mechanical process and, until someone invents a digital brain interface (ouch!), the quality of sound we ultimately hear is dependent on how the loudspeaker systems convert the electrical signal to moving air molecules.

The primary improvements to sound quality that are created by digital processes are increased dynamic range, lower distortion, lower noise, and more channels. Performance advantages have removed many constraints faced by film soundtrack creators and mixers, because the limitations of optical and even magnetic sound do not exist with digital. The result: Soundtracks are becoming much more sophisticated in the subtle and sometimes not-so-subtle (think explosions) sounds that can be captured on the soundtrack. This makes the job of the loudspeaker system even more critical—and challenging.

The good news is that only the strong will survive; inferior equipment will quickly succumb to the demands of digital sound. The pervasiveness of digital soundtracks for feature films and the equipping of nearly 15,000 of the world's cinemas with the capability to play back digital has provided new motivation to increase research and development programs for advanced sound systems for motion picture sound mixing and playback. The aim of these R&D programs must to be provide systems that can take full advantage of everything that digital sound technology can offer to theatre exhibitors. In so doing, advanced cinema loudspeaker systems must provide the new "canvas" for sound artists to communicate their work to moviegoers, much the same way that new grades and formulations of film stock provide better color quality and clarity for the visual experience.

The good news is that only the strong will survive; inferior equipment will quickly succumb to the demands of digital sound.

Translating the benefits of digital soundtracks (increased dynamic range, lower distortion, lower noise, and more channels) into requirements for tomorrow's cinema sound systems requires a reexamination of every aspect of how sound is heard in the cinema. Dynamic range means the range from the quietest to the loudest section of the soundtrack—"from a whisper to a scream." It is important to note that this does not necessarily mean films will be played louder in theatres, although the higher dynamic range of digital does allow greater sound pressure levels to be delivered to the loudspeakers. The capability is often abused, and repeated abuse will lead to loudspeaker and hearing damage. This is not why digital sound is so great, and this is definitely not why loudspeaker manufacturers are developing improved systems. What is important is that the soundtrack and the loudspeaker system work together to allow the artist (director, sound editor, etc.) more freedom to create the sound environment that is necessary to support the film.

To be able to play back the additional dynamic range, a loudspeaker system requires sufficient "headroom." Headroom can be visualized as reserve power so that the system is not constantly working at its maximum. It is similar conceptually to driving a race car down a city street; it does not need to be driven at its maximum potential speed, and it is certainly not stressed at slower speeds. In sound system language, this means more amplifier power and speakers of higher power-handling capability. Because a system that has greater headroom is less often pushed to its limits, that system is also more reliable over many years of service in moviehouses.

Because the digital signal provided by the soundtrack is typically free from medium-induced distortion (such as tape saturation or optical overload), any distortion caused by the speaker system itself will become more noticeable. So an improved system for digital must also minimize distortion to fully translate the digital signal. The bad news is that distortion is inherent with any transducer (i.e., a device that converts energy from one form to another—electrical to acoustical, in the case of a loudspeaker), so the goal is to minimize it. The same is true with noise: Every electrical device in the signal path from the microphone to the loudspeaker induces some level of audible noise, but the medium itself provides a virtually noise-free transfer, so again the goal is to minimize it in the electronics associated with the loudspeaker system.

Digital soundtracks also offer the capability for more channels of sound, such as stereo or "split surrounds," or the addition of Left-Extra and Right-Extra screen channels with the eight-channel SDDS process. This new capability does not directly affect loudspeaker design as much as it affects the implementation of loudspeakers in the actual cinema.

To achieve the goal of designing a cinema loudspeaker system capable of delivering the potential of digital soundtracks requires reexamining conventional speaker system design—keeping what works and developing new approaches to exceed old limitations. Two-way speaker system design has been with us since the 1920s, and it has served well until the sound source (digital soundtracks) outstripped the two-way concept's ability to meet ıe dynamic range, power handling and distortion levels of digi-l. As with other areas of pro-:ssional sound, the time has come) consider the three-way system ɔncept for cinema sound.

With a three-way system, the job of reproducing the entire audio spec-um is divided among three, in-tead of two, sections. Each ection now 'orks a little ess hard, so verall system eadroom can e increased, long with reater overall ystem reliabil-y. In addition, ach section can e optimized for hat part of the udio spectrum is reproduc-ıg—rather like iring a special-t for each job. more vivid nage is that of three-person triathlon team, 'here a swimmer, a runner and a yclist each contribute to the over-ll goal of the race, yet each is a pecialist in his event. With a ree-way system, each compo-ent is designed specifically for ɔw-, mid- or high-frequency udio reproduction, and the entire ystem faces far fewer compro-ises as a result.

Conceptually, the three-way ɔncept offers all of the necessary erformance advantages that digi-l soundtracks demand, but there ; the added complexity of two rossover points (the parts of the 'equency response at which the ɔw-frequency section stops 'orking and the midsection takes ver, and at which the mid-frequency section gives way to the high-frequency section). Also, the three different devices must be "time aligned" in the vertical plane so that signals from all three sections reach the listeners "in phase," or at the same time. Fortunately, digital technology provides a simply implemented solution for these and other system complexities. Because each system will be installed in a different cinema environment, and each cinema has its own acoustic characteristics, attention must be paid to the speaker/room interaction if the three-way system is to be fully optimized. All these functions (crossovers, time alignment and equalization) can be easily addressed using digital technology.

It is worth making the necessary investments [so] the improvements offered by digital sound can be realized.

There is no doubt that digital film sound technology places extra demands on the last remaining "analog" link in the audio chain. But it also offers amazingly powerful tools for getting the most out of tomorrow's cinema loudspeaker systems. For the future of our industry, it is worth making the necessary investments to make sure that the improvements offered by digital sound can be realized in movie theatres. This necessarily dictates a change in the way that we think about cinema sound—and a change in the way we implement sound in theatres.

WIDE AWAKE ★★★

Starring Joseph Cross, Dana Delany, Denis Leary, Robert Loggia and Rosie O'Donnell. Directed and written by M. Night Shyamalan. Produced by Cary Woods and Cathy Konrad. A Miramax release. Comedy/drama. Rated PG for language and thematic elements. Running time: 88 min.

"My grandpa and me, we always watched out for each other," new fifth-grader Joshua (newcomer Joseph Cross) says by way of introducing this story about a young boy's coming of (religious) age. Raised in a contemporary but devout Catholic family, Joshua experiences a crisis of faith when dear Grandpa Beal (Robert Loggia, playing effectively against type) passes away; how could such misery happen if a supreme being exists? "I'm going on a mission," Joshua tells best friend Dave (Timothy Reifsnyder) at the Waldron Academy for boys. "What are you going to look for?" Dave asks. Joshua's reply: "God."

AWAKENINGS: Joseph Cross and Rosie O'Donnell in Miramax's "Wide Awake."

In a usually deft weaving of narrative and subnarratives, writer/director M. Night Shyamalan ("Praying With Anger") takes Joshua on a journey not commonly seen in today's cinema: one into faith. Divided into three chapters (The Questions, The Signs and The Answers) and featuring fine character turns from Dana Delany ("Exit to Eden") as Joshua's caring obstetrician mom, Denis Leary ("The Ref") as his concerned physician dad and Rosie O'Donnell (also "Exit to Eden") as a sports-loving nun, "Wide Awake" avoids most of the bathos (and his acting) that marred Shyamalan's "Praying With Anger," leaving more room for the filmmaker's dexterity with the simpler emotions. Fine family fare, "Wide Awake" still gives its theological concerns more than modest authenticity.

Yet "Wide Awake" hardly delves to Rilkean levels of religious discourse, the family's sure wealth works against the sense of crisis, and recurring appearances of an angelic little boy (Michael Craig Bigwood) are obvious in import. Yet "Wide Awake" profits from heartfelt and sensitive telling and from its structured symbolism; as Joshua interacts with people and nature, he advances toward his goal. Cross does a nice job, though the anguish delivered by Ciaran Fitzgerald in Mike Newell's "Into the West" seems beyond him (and Shyamalan); matters never get too uncomfortable. Still, in a moviemaking world dominated by attention to secular matters, the parochial "Wide Awake" is a refreshing change of pace.—Kim Williamson

CHRISTMAS ORATORIO ★★

Starring Johan Widerberg and Lena Endre. Directed by Kjell-Ake Andersson. Written by Kjell Sundstedt and Kjell-Ake Andersson. Produced by Katinka Farago and Anita Hallgren. A Sandrews Film production; no stateside distributor set. Drama. Swedish-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 124 min. Won best actress prize (Lena Endre).

"Christmas Oratorio" ("Juloratoriet") takes some odd twists, most of them unconvincing, in its tale of a young family surviving the death of its mother. The title, for example, refers to the demanding Bach composition that Solveig (Julie Christie lookalike Lena Endre), a radiant mother and music lover, persuades her village choir to attempt. Solveig dies in a horrible accident before she can see the piece performed. Although the introduction of the "Christmas Oratorio" heralds a major metaphor if ever there was one, it isn't really touched upon again until the movie's final scene, when Solveig's grandson, now an eminent conductor, realizes her dream.

Instead, most of the film is devoted to the separate torments of Solveig's husband (Peter Haber), who strikes up an unlikely pen-pal romance with a New Zealand farm girl and who sees the ghost of his now mocking wife everywhere; and of her teenaged son, Sidner (Johan Widerberg), who is set upon by the town's silly middle-age seductress (Viveka Seldahl), who bears his love-child and drives Sidner to an asylum and...well, the plot gets even more convoluted, so it's probably best to leave it at that. The rest of the story—suicide, reconciliation, long journeys—sails along with the audience left scratching their heads back on the dock. An improbable conclusion is particularly stilted and odd.

The film has a chilly elegance as well as a deliberate "this is a drama" tone that make it hard to warm to, despite the beauty of its Swedish setting and the plaintiveness of actor Widerberg. It does, however, feature in a completely unironic role a legless man as a character who formerly worked as a human cannonball (Tomas von Bromssen), which gives the film a kind of distinction, though what exactly is hard to specify.

EAST SIDE STORY ★★★1/2

Directed by Dana Ranga. Written by Andrew Horn and Dana Ranga. Produced by Andrew Horn. A Kino Intl. release. Documentary. English, Russian and other languages; English subtitles. Unrated. Running time: 77 min.

Chorines in overalls, wheat-sheaving choreography, and lyrics like "Harvest, harvest! Our quota has been obtained!": Who'd have thought socialist culture could be so cheesy.

And so entertaining. With this Anda Films production, writer/producer Andrew Horn and co-writer/director Dana Ranga have unearthed some gems from the musical archives of the former Soviet Union, the former East Germany, the former Czechoslovakia and other

A LIFE IN REVIEW

Jesse Shlyen, Whose Work at BOXOFFICE Always Merited Five Stars, Passes Away

BOXOFFICE MAGAZINE lost a piece of its history with the recent passing of Jesse Shlyen at age 87. Jesse—who with our founder, his older brother Ben Shlyen, and our advertising consultant Morrie Schlozman formed the indispensable troika that built BOXOFFICE into the journalistic institution it is today—spent his entire working life with the magozine, rising up the ranks all the way to the Managing Editor's slot.

"Jessie Shlyen was not only a close friend," Morrie says. "We were like brothers. Jessie and I were teenage buddies, doing the town in my 1927 Essex. In 1931, during the Great Depression, when the company where I was working folded, it was Jessie who introduced me to Ben.

"Jessie was a loyal, kind friend, a great editor and writer, and a powerful force in the success of BOXOFFICE," Morrie says. "I shall never forget him."

Jesse's involvement with BOXOFFICE began with the very first issue, published more than 77 years ago when he was just 11 years old. The magazine was called The Reel Journal back then; it would be 13 more years before Ben Shlyen assembled the elements to take BOXOFFICE national, and the rechristening took place at that time. Jesse helped get the word out from day one; when Ben needed assistance delivering the premiere issue of his original exhibitor newsletter to the colorful inhabitants of Kansas City's film exchange (known as Film Row), Jesse hopped on his bike and delivered copies by hand.

The Shlyen family were exhibitors themselves, and Jesse learned about exhibition at their family-owned Maple Theater, where during his teenage years Jesse would serve variously as cashier, ticket taker, bill poster, popcorn vendor and publicist. The whole time, Jesse also held down regular duties at The Reel Journal, first as a print-shop worker and later as a staff writer.

From 1929 to 1932, Jesse was editor of The Reel Journal and contributed news from the Kansas City market. Brother Ben was off about the business of building a publication empire through the acquisition of various regional exhibitor newsletters, which were united under the BOXOFFICE name with the publication of our first national edition on May 4, 1933. By that point, Jesse had moved into the circulation department—a post later passed to Morrie Schlozman who, like Jesse, would wear many hats at the magazine. During Jesse's and Morrie's watch, BOXOFFICE rose to a position of pre-eminence, becoming the magazine with the largest verified circulation of any publication for exhibitors—a title it holds to this day.

Jesse's unprecedented run as managing editor began in 1936 and lasted more than four decades, right up until his retirement. It was interrupted only by two years of military service during World War II. His contributions to BOXOFFICE just cannot be calculated; his last appearance in our pages occurred in 1995, when he was a profile subject for an issue dedicated to the 75th anniversary of the first issue of The Reel Journal that Jesse had helped hand deliver.

It's fitting, then, that we pay tribute to Jesse in our 1997 Buyers' directory—the 59th annual edition of an industry classic that Jesse himself toiled to launch. Along with Ben and Morrie, Jesse helped light, tend and feed the flame of the torch that has been passed to those of us who work here today. What we hope it illuminates is that which Jesse was instrumental in bequeathing to us: the best, most timely, most entertaining and above all most informative publication for exhibition professionals available anywhere, at any price.

Sleep well, Jesse. Sleep well.—Ray Greene

Jesse Shlyen is survived by sons Sanford and Stephen, daughter Nancy Dorfman, sister Estaire Nelson, and grandson Brian Dorfman. Jesse's wife of 40 years, Bertha, died in 1980.

FEST REVIEWS: GALWAY, IRELAND

Incoming European correspondent TONY DEANE reports on the Galway fest from Ireland.

THE BUTCHER BOY ★★★★

Starring Eamonn Owens, Alan Boyle, Stephen Rea, Aisling O'Sullivan, Fiona Shaw, Brendan Gleeson and Ian Hart. Directed and produced by Neil Jordan. Written by Patrick McCable and Neil Jordan. A Warner Bros. release. Drama. Rated R for language and violence. Running time: 109 min.

This may be an Irish-made movie with local surroundings, but it could be set anywhere in the world. Based on a best-selling novel by Patrick McCabe, "The Butcher Boy" is set in a small Irish town in the 1960s. The cinema and radio are what keep the locals going, and young Francie Brady is no different than anyone else. A boy with a fertile imagination, he listens to the adults as they argue the ways of the world, in particular the Cuban missile crisis.

Coming from a dysfunctional family (his father is an alcoholic, his mother is a suicidal manic-depressive), Francie is closest to his school chum Joe. Life is best for him when they act out the cowboy and Indian games based on what they've read in comic books. Living with a drunken father and a mother who is forever preparing cakes for the imminent arrival of "Uncle Alo" from London does not deter the cheerful lad. Life gets cruel, however, and he loses his father, mother and friend, which leaves him insecure and threatened by his adult surroundings. In order to get his own back on the world, he takes his anger out on a snobbish neighbor who won't let her son play with him; the fact that she dresses in shock green makes him think she's like one of the aliens in his comics.

Neil Jordan's 10th film is an extraordinary piece of cinema. It features almost an entire Irish cast, including Stephen Rea as the father and Aisling O'Sullivan as the mother; pop singer Sinead O'Connor appears in the film's apparition sequences as the Virgin Mary. Perhaps the most astounding performer in the film is a youngster named Eamonn Owens, who plays the young boy. With no acting experience, he was picked from 2,000 other hopefuls for the part; Alan Boyle, who comes from the same school, plays his pal Joe to perfection. This film gives life to the screen, capturing an era long forgotten. And not only are the performances stunning; so is Jordan's direction, of the caliber that says "Oscar."

BOGWOMAN ★★★

Starring Peter Mullan and Sean McGinley. Directed and written by Tom Collins. Produced by Martha O'Neill and Tom Collins. A De Facto production; no stateside distributor set. Drama. Not yet rated. Running time: 80 min.

The Bogside in Derry, Northern Ireland is the setting for this striking movie about the women of the area known worldwide for "the troubles." The film goes a long way to explain the origins of the civil rights movement: The setting is right before Bloody Sunday, when many marchers for Irish freedom were shot by British troops.

A woman goes back to her old home in the country to see the last of it as it's being pulled down. Safe for the moment and away from the troubled place in which she now must live, she picks up a bulb from the ground to bring back home with her the feeling of having "roots."

A lot of the Irish question makes its way into the plot as the old woman tells her story; in between, the film shows different aspects of life up north. Well made and acted, "Bogwoman" is a strong look at the political situation and the human condition in Northern Ireland.

THE DISAPPEARANCE OF FINBAR ★1/2

Starring Jonathan Rhys-Myers, Luke Griffin and Sean McGinley. Directed by Sue Clayton. Written by Sue Clayton and Dermot Bolger. Produced by Martin Bruce-Clayton, David Collins, Bertil Ohisson and Soren Staemose. A Samson production; no stateside distributor set. Drama. Not yet rated.

Young Finbar comes from a dilapidiated housing estate in the south of the city; his father had little success with his singing career, so he invests his energies into his son. The lad gets a chance at becoming a footballer and is given a hero's send-off by the community. Within a month, he's back. He calls on his friend Danny, who has always been there for him, and in a moment of self-pity Finbar falls from a bridge. Friends search for him, but there is no trace of a body. After months pass, a garbled phone call from Stockholm to Danny gives the first clue as to Finbar's whereabouts. Danny sets off to find him, meeting up with all sorts of eccentric characters who eventually lead him to Lapland, where he finds our hero.

For almost an hour, moviegoers are treated to the culture of Lapland and Stockholm. Yet this could have been a silent film; there is very little dialogue (most of what there is in Scandinavian languages and isn't subtitled, in any case), so audiences are left with little explanation why a local girl beds Danny while all the men in the village snigger. The film is beautiful, but there's so much of that beauty and so little going on plotwise that the movie almost disappears like Finbar. Luke Griffin as Danny holds the film together with his facial expressions, and Jonathan Rhys-Myers as Finbar lights up the screen with his presence. Except for that, however, "The Disappearance of Finbar" has little to keep patrons from making a similar exit.

parts of a world that no longer exists to make a documentary that manages to illuminate a fascinating corner of humanity while remaining witty fun.

Using film clips and interviews with the era's technicians and stars (including two identified as the Elvis and the Doris Day of the East), "East Side Story" shows how these musicals acted as both propaganda and escapism for their audiences. Despite the fact that the genre originated in Hollywood, Stalin, it turns out, was its biggest booster, supporting films that portrayed cheerful workers harmonizing about the good life, while in reality his purges were diminishing the flocks. Meanwhile, films like the 1958 East German hit "My Wife Wants to Sing," in which a Mrs. Cleaver-ish hausfrau becomes a glamorous performer, thrilled audiences while offending communist censors. The filmmakers parallel such movies with Hollywood's lush-life musicals of the Depression era, depicting a fantasy world when reality was anything but.

The best part of "East Side Story" is that it is copiously illustrated with kitschy excerpts from films such as "Tractor Drivers" (USSR, 1939), "I Don't Want to Marry" (Romania, 1961) and "No Cheating Darling" (East Germany, 1973), which give the documentary its humor and energy. Seeing a scene from East Germany's version of "Beach Blanket Bingo"—1968's "Hot Summer"—with its Frankie and Annette doppelgangers is kind of like climbing through the looking glass. It's this delicious sense of the bizarre that makes "East Side Story" as suited to a midnight-movie marquee as to an art-house.

FORGOTTEN LIGHT ★★1/2

Starring Boleslav Polivka and Veronika Zilkova. Directed by Vladimir Michalek. Written by Milena Jelinek. Produced by Alice Nemanska, Jana Tomsova and Ivana Kacirkova. A Studia Fama 92 production; no stateside distributor set. Drama. Czech-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 101 min. Won best actor (Boleslav Polivka) and an audience award.

The makers of "Forgotten Light" ("Zapomenute svetlo") deal with recent Czech past in this story of a beleaguered village priest and a small group of parishioners struggling to save their church in 1987, two years before the communists, with their repressive religious policies, fell. Considering its elements—a dying mother, a crisis of faith, plus a flood and some fire—the movie has surprisingly little power.

What it does have is a somber steadiness and a cohesiveness. It also has the calmly magnetic presence of Boleslav Polivka, who (in a best-actor-winning performance) plays denim-and-leather-clad Father Holy. The film touches on the issue of members of the Catholic hierarchy who collaborated with the communists. The film's making must be a release of sorts, given that its story couldn't be told even a decade ago. Still, the main question "Forgotten Light" raises is: Why this film now?

FESTIVAL REVIEWS

THE GOOD LIFE ★★★

Starring Fernando Ramallo and Lucia Jimenez. Directed and written by David Trueba. Produced by Ana Huete and Cristina Huete. A Fernando Trueba, Kaplan & Olmo Films production; no stateside distributor set. Drama. Spanish-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 108 min. Won a special jury prize.

A kind of Spanish "Wonder Years," "The Good Life" ("La buena vida") is about how 15-year-old Tristan (a very natural Fernando Ramallo) copes when both mortality and sex hit him in the face. When the film begins, he's just another smart-ass kid, good-humoredly recounting his parents' foibles (including his own conception the night Franco died) by inserting himself into the retelling. Then tragedy strikes: Tristan's parents are killed in a car accident. He is left with his doddering grandfather (Luis Cuenca), a sympathetic teacher (Isabell Otero) and a sexy firebug of a cousin (Lucia Jimenez) to comfort him.

In recounting the painful adjustments Tristan must make, the film manages not to wallow in the tragic, instead leavening the proceedings with realistic humor. It also manages the tricky act of putting Tristan's sexual explorations against such a woeful backdrop without trivializing the situation: he's grieving and trying to score at the same time.

That said, the film doesn't take its audience to any great heights, although it elicits a few lumps in the throat. Most of the time, "The Good Life" unreels in that comfort zone between close-to-the-bone truthfulness and too-clever artificiality. It's a relief for a filmgoer who doesn't want to be wrung dry, but it also leaves one with the nagging feeling that if it had taken a few risks it would have been harder to watch but a better film for the sacrifice.

LATE FULL MOON 1/2

Starring Icchak Finci and Nikolaj Urumov. Directed and written by Eduard Zachariev. Produced by Edi Yahariev. A Bulgarian National Television and Budapest Filmstudio production; no stateside distributor set. Drama. Bulgarian-language; French subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 120 min.

It's nice to hear a voice from Bulgaria, but did it have to be this film? "Late Full Moon" ("Zakasnialo palnolunie") examines the generational breach wrought by the fall of communism in Europe, leaving a Wild East of mafia capitalists among the young and deepening poverty among the old. The Old Man (Icchak Finci) is one of the latter. He tsk-tsks the shallow life of his son (Nikolaj Urumov): nude-model wife, thieving son, twittering cell phone. Soon he's spiraling into Sofia's dregs: first a prison-like old folks' home, then a garbage dump lorded over by a trash-palace Gypsy.

Some bad performances, jarring transitions, teen-age villains from the "Saved by the Bell" school of subtlety, a busload of old-people cliches and, finally, spelling mistakes in the French subtitles make "Late Full Moon" a tedious experience.

ORBIS PICTUS ★★★

Starring Dorotka Nvotova and Marian Labuda. Directed by Martin Sulik. Written by Martin Sulik, Marek Lescak and Ondrej Sulaj. Produced by Rudolf Biermann. An In Film production; no stateside distributor set. Drama. Slovak-language; French subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 105 min.

"Orbis Pictus" is inscrutable yet curiously satisfying. Sixteen-year-old Tereza (Dorotka Nvotova) leaves her wayward-girls home to find the mother who put her there. She tramps across Slovakia, ablaze in fall colors; as in a Middle Europe fairy tale, she suffers the perils of forest and city, meeting odd characters along the way.

An old woman buried to her neck in soil, a May-September couple celebrating their folk wedding, a distinguished man hiding in a restaurant kitchen: Their stories are nominally explained, but whatever they're meant to symbolize hovers above the scene like a ghost refusing to be acknowledged. Perhaps it's a parable of a girl facing precarious womanhood: Tereza's encounters have an undertone of sexual menace.

UNDER THE BRIDGE ★★1/2

Starring Damien Leake and Melissa Leo. Directed and written by Charles Weinstein. Produced by Charles Weinstein and Andy Clark. A Soho Partnership production; no stateside distributor set. Drama. Not yet rated. Running time: 90 min.

"Under the Bridge" might have seemed fresh a decade ago because of its from-within portrayal of a homeless community as well as its vivid, if romanticized, performances. Today, though, that's not enough.

The catalyst for looking at this particular collection of roof-challenged individuals is the appearance of Eddie, an eight-year-old runaway orphan who appears at their squat under New York's Williamsburg Bridge. He joins a familiar group: There's the black sage (Damien Leake); the junkie prostitute with fabulous hair (Melissa Leo); the crusty but kind-hearted overseer (Zach Grenier). The kid (Matthew Weathers) is cute but personality-free. It's easy to forecast the movie's plot: Junkies overdose, dreams are shattered, some people die, others get a shot at redemption. It's really not a bad story, just a too-familiar one.

FEST: MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA

COURTING COURTNEY ★★★★

Starring Dana Gould, Eliza Coyle, Taylor Negron and Sean Masterson. Directed and written by Paul Tarantino. Produced by Hadeel Reda, Serge Rodnunsky and Paul Tarantino. A Toasted Films production; no stateside distributor set. Romantic comedy. Not yet rated. Running time: 84 min.

Perhaps the most original romantic comedy of its kind since "When Harry Met Sally...," this deceptively clever debut by writer/director Paul Tarantino (no relation to Quentin) emerges as both a genuine crowd-pleaser and a surprisingly poignant look at the chaos of modern courtship.

COURTERS: Dana Gould and Eliza Coyle in Paul Tarantino's "Courting Courtney."

An inventive faux documentary structure focuses on the ongoing romantic crises of 29-year-old Courtney Baker (Eliza Coyle) as recorded by her best friend and aspiring filmmaker Nick Hastings (Dana Gould). As Courtney finds herself on the verge of her 30th birthday and no closer to finding a suitable mate than when she and Nick were unsuccessful high school sweethearts, Nick looks for an explanation. Interviews with ex-boyfriends, family members, friends and acquaintances are interspersed with flashbacks and real-time intrusions into Courtney's private life, slowly and steadily building a portrait of romantic dysfunctionality as funny as it is touching. Episodes centering around a misfit singles support group and its less-than-ethical patron, Doctor Phelps (veteran comic Taylor Negron), are priceless.

Unlike such popular mockumentaries as "This Is Spinal Tap" and "Bob Roberts," however, "Courting Courtney" is neither cynical nor satirical. Even at their most bizarre, the emotions and relationships always ring true, a credit not only to Tarantino's writing but to an eclectic and able cast. Gould's breezy affability and Coyle's homespun charms anchor the picture solidly among such familiar comic faces as Kathy Griffin, Ryan Stiles, "Saturday Night Live" alum Julia Sweeney and Negron, who proves to be a scene-stealer. Technically, the film is similarly polished, exhibiting no traces of its rumored five-figure budget. Deftly edited and crisply photographed, "Courting Courtney" is currently seeking a stateside distributor, but European audiences in Holland and Belgium will see the film released, respectively, during this September and October.

Tarantino's skillful blending of unabashed honesty and romantic optimism is a feat that's almost as impressive as true love itself.—Wade Major

CANNES

A, B, C... MANHATTAN ★★1/2

Starring Lucy Knight and Erin Norris. Directed by Amir Naderi. Written by Ben Edlund and Jessica Gholke with Maryam Dalan, Tracy McMillan and Amir Naderi. Produced by Amir Naderi and William Rexer II. No stateside distributor set. Drama. Not yet rated. Running time: 90 min.

Iranian-born director Amir Naderi has set this film in the Lower East Side of Manhattan, where he now resides; its title comes from Avenues A, B and C. Its central characters are three young woman who share an apartment. Colleen (Lucy Knight) is a single mother and photographer. Kacey (Erin Norris) has lost both her boyfriend and girlfriend, but is most concerned with retrieving her pet dog. Kate (Sara Paul) is an aspiring musician who has come to New York to escape a troubled relationship.

"A, B, C... Manhattan" is most successful in establishing a vivid atmosphere of life on the edge. Naderi, who also edits, combines long takes with tight spaces to emphasize the constricted feeling of the characters and their lack of options. Not much happens in the thin screenplay, co-written by Naderi. For a large part of the film, people are "making time" in a neighborhood bar. The characters are dominated by the movie's setting, although Knight does convey Colleen's pain as she realizes she may have to give up her daughter.—Ed Scheid

THE BROTHER ★★★

Starring Serguei Bodorov, Viktor Soukhoroukov and Svetlana Pismitchenko. Directed and written by Alexei Balabanov. Produced by STW Film Co. No stateside distributor set. Drama. Russian-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 99 min.

"The Brother" ("Brat") is set in contemporary Russia, but both the story and style of the film have outside influences. Danila (Serguei Bodorov) returns home after serving two years in the army. Bored by small-town life, Danila decides to visit his older brother, who has a prosperous life in St. Petersburg. The brother has never given the details of how he's made his fortune, and Danila discovers that his brother (Viktor Soukhoroukov) is a contract killer for one of the city's mob factions.

Danila encounters the worst effects of Westernization. The mean streets of post-Soviet Union St. Petersburg are full of violence and drugs. He saves an old man from an extortionist and steals a gun. Urban Russian life is also dominated by American culture in less dangerous ways: Danila is constantly trying to find the latest CD of his favorite rock band and eventually attends one of their concerts.

Putting his military training to good use, Danila becomes a member of his brother's mob and is assigned to kill a rival gangster. He successfully carries out his assignment but ends up running for his life, although along the way he does find time for romance with both a pretty trolley conductor (Svetlana Pismitchenko) and a drug addict.

"The Brother" has the gritty look typical of Soviet films. But, like the events and details of the story, the style is influenced by American films. It's very fast-paced, with some last-minute escapes from danger. Bodorov, who played the young recruit in "Prisoner of the Mountains," again has a strong screen presence. In the end, the film is engrossing, but it doesn't take the time to go beneath the surface of its characterizations. And there's enough violence and gunfire for a Hollywood summer movie.—Ed Scheid

THE BRAVE ★1/2

Starring Johnny Depp, Marlon Brando, Marshall Bell, Elpidia Carrillo and Clarence Williams III. Directed by Johnny Depp. Written by Johnny Depp, D.P. Depp and Paul McCudden. Produced by Charles Evans Jr. and Carroll Kemp. No stateside distributor set. Drama. Not yet rated. Running time: 123 min.

As if the story of a man selling himself to a snuff production to help support his family weren't gruesome enough, a horrific murder/suicide involving the film's original director has long kept the "The Brave" atop Hollywood's "least wanted" list. Had a star of Johnny Depp's stature not entered the picture, it's likely the project would have remained stalled, and rightfully so.

As the film starts, a young Native American man named Raphael (Depp) walks, strolls and meanders his way through a Southwestern wasteland for a meeting with a mysterious, wheelchair-bound Mr. McCarthy (Marlon Brando). Down in the bowels of some kind of abandoned factory, McCarthy appears before him, rambles incoherently for several minutes about a "job," and then dismisses Raphael with a hefty "down payment."

Subsequent scenes focus on Raphael's relationship with wife and children, the abject poverty in which they live, and the friction created by his sudden and unexplained increase in wealth. Eventually, it becomes clear that this "job" involves sacrificing his life, although the notion that this is in the service of a snuff film is hinted at only in the vaguest possible terms.

As an exercise in how a wafer-thin concept can be stretched past the two-hour mark, "The Brave" is a resounding success. As an attempt at communicating a message about Native American poverty, it's a disaster. Shots of Depp walking, walking, walking, walking and walking obliterate any sense of pace or focus, instead serving only to prolong transition time between a handful of dialogue scenes that are neither interesting nor enlightening.

As credited co-writer, director and star, it's hard to lay blame for the film's failure on anyone but Depp, however harsh that verdict might seem. With protracted, lingering shots of himself in various states of distress peppered throughout the film, it would be easy to accuse Depp of narcissism if not for the fact that there's simply nothing else in the film worth photographing.

"The Brave" is still without an American distributor and is likely to remain so until its producers resign themselves to a lower asking price. At that time, the film will be able to move on and promptly find itself without an audience.—Wade Major

EAST PALACE, WEST PALACE ★★★1/2

Starring Si Han and Hu Jun. Directed and produced by Zhang Yuan. Written by Wang Xiaobo and Zhang Yuan. No stateside distributor set. Drama. Mandarin-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 94 min.

What kind of 50th-anniversary Cannes fest would it be if the Chinese failed to cause a brouhaha? Thanks to bad-boy filmmaker Zhang Yuan's gay-themed "East Palace, West Palace," no one will ever know.

So furious were the powers within the Chinese government with the film's inclusion in Un Certain Regard that Zhang's passport was confiscated and Zhang Yimou's "Keep Cool" was pulled from the competition. And yet, by comparison to the fest's other gay-themed Chinese film (Hong Kong filmmaker Wong Kar-Wai's "Happy Together"), "East Palace, West Palace" seems downright prudish.

What distinguishes "East Palace, West Palace" ultimately has less to do with its politics than its dramatics. Arguably the most compelling new Chinese film since the rise of the Fifth Generation, Zhang's mostly self-financed chamber piece is something of a small miracle, a film that makes an audacious frontal assault on traditional Chinese sensibilities and taboos even as it nevertheless clings steadfastly to a meticulous aesthetic tradition.

Focusing almost exclusively on a night-long conversation between a Tianenmen park police officer and a gay man he has detained for lewd conduct, "East Palace, West Palace" is structured as a mental tango, a dance of wits wherein deep inhibitions and hidden desires are methodically laid bare. As the gay A-Lan, actor Si Han creates a heart-rending portrait of a man wholly at peace with his lifestyle, despite the inevitability of persecution. Alternating ambiguously between episodes of torment and bliss, his "confession" unfolds like a mystery novel, drawing policeman Shi Xiaohua (Hu Jun) unwittingly into a carefully crafted emotional trap.

Had the film succeeded on a purely psychological level, it would be impressive enough. But Zhang extends his attention to detail to every aspect of the film's technical execution as well, marking a giant step forward from such earlier, rougher works as the notorious "Beijing Bastards." Whether or not Zhang will be allowed to continue making films, or under what conditions that might happen, remains to be seen. Either way, the mere existence of "East Palace, West Palace" bodes well not just for the future of Chinese filmmaking but for Chinese society itself.—Wade Major

HAPPY TOGETHER ★★

Starring Leslie Cheung and Tony Leung Chiu-Wai. Directed, written and produced by Wong Kar-Wai. A Kino release. Romance. Cantonese-, Mandarin- and Spanish-language; English subtitles. Unrated. Running time: 94 min. Won best director.

Yet another (over)extended rock video masquerading as an Asian art film from Hong Kong's shades-laden king of cool, Wong Kar-Wai's "Happy Together" is noteworthy for not much else than the casting of sex symbols Leslie Cheung ("Farewell My Concubine") and Tony Leung Chiu-Wai ("Chungking Express," "Hard-Boiled") as its story's gay lovers.

Shock value and the Cannes fest's best director prize aside, Wong's follow-up to the lavishly overpraised "Chungking Express" offers little in the way of stylistic or narrative progress, although it should please his core fans. As with previous efforts, Wong's "style" here consists primarily of random experimentation with film stocks, exposures, frame rates and other assorted laboratory tricks. Had such tinkering been in the service of a story! But a near-total absence of narrative very quickly makes even the most minute excesses in style almost unbearably tedious. As music and imagery splash, audiences are treated to nothing more exciting than boy meets boy, boy loses boy, boy gets boy back, boy loses boy, boy gets boy back, boy loses boy, und so weiter.

The affair isn't as tedious as it might have been, thanks primarily to a beguiling Argentinean setting, nicely photographed by Christopher Doyle whenever Wong's meddling is kept to a minimum. But such interludes are outnumbered by an endless parade of closeups revealing the lead actors in various states of angst and contemplation. By the time the credits roll to a blithe cover of the '60s rock ditty "Happy Together," audiences might not be so appreciative of the titular irony.—Wade Major

JOURNEY TO THE BEGINNING OF THE WORLD ★★1/2

Starring Marcello Mastroianni, Jean Yves Gautier and Leonor Silveira. Directed and written by Manoel de Oliveira. Produced by Paulo Branco. No stateside distributor set. Drama. French- and Portuguese-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 93 min.

"Journey to the Beginning of the World" ("Viagem Ao Principio Do Mundo") contains the 171st film appearance by Marcello Mastroianni, notable because it's the last of his many memorable performances before his death in December of last year. Mastroianni's character here is very similar to Manoel de Oliveira, the film's 88-year-old writer/director. Both have the same profession, the same first name and wear a similar floppy-brimmed hat.

Alfonso (Jean Yves Gautier) is a French actor with a role in a Franco-Portuguese co-production. His dead father was from Portugal. He decides to visit his dad's home village and to meet a surviving aunt. Because Alfonso does not speak Portuguese, the film's director, Manoel (Mastroianni), and two other actors accompany him to translate. As their car drives through the rural roads, the sights trigger the director's reminiscences of his early life. At journey's end, the travelers find a village full of harsh conditions and unhappy memories.

Providing a depth the rest of the film lacks, Mastroianni's performance shows his remarkable range. He's full of charm while bantering with a young actress (Leonor Silveira); closeups show Mastroianni's face full of emotion and warmth as the director recalls events from his past. He even makes a face full of childish delight at a stuffed cat. But the main storyline, of the actor investigating his Portuguese roots, is too slight to maintain much interest when Mastroianni is not onscreen. Part of the reason is that the script doesn't develop the other characters on the journey, and much of de Oliveira's directorial style consists of a repetitious combination of conversations in the car and shots of the road as if viewed from the back window.—Ed Scheid

LA FEMME DEFENDUE ★★

Starring Isabelle Carre and Philippe Harel. Directed by Philippe Harel. Written by Eric Assous. Produced by Les Productions Lazennec. No stateside distributor set. Drama. French-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 102 min.

This film is a cinematic exercise on adultery in which the camera literally becomes the eyes of the man: Only his field of vision is seen on the screen. Francois (director Philippe Harel) is 39 and married. He has met the unmarried Muriel (Isabelle Carre), age 22, at a party. He persuades her to meet him at a bar. Later, they begin an affair.

Because "La Femme Defendue" is told from the man's point of view, Harel is only briefly seen reflected in a mirror. Most of the screen time focuses on Carre as her character speaks with her lover. She has a captivating presence, but not enough to sustain this film, which seems too drawn out at feature length. The dialogue is routine and without any insight, and the screenplay has too many repetitious scenes in which Francois persuades Muriel to continue the affair when she wants to end it.—Ed Scheid

POST COITUM: ANIMAL TRISTE ★★★1/2

Starring Brigitte Rouan, Patrick Chesnais, Boris Terral and Nils Tavernier. Directed by Brigitte Rouan. Written by Brigitte Rouan, Santiago Amigorena, Jean-Louis Richard, Guy Zilberstein and Philippe Le Guay. Produced by Humbert Balsan. No stateside distributor set. Drama. French-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 99 min.

This film's title is a quotation from the Roman poet Ovid about unhappiness following lovemaking; it's an apt expression of the movie's theme of a love affair's painful effects. Diane (director/co-writer Brigitte Rouan) is 40ish and comfortable in her relationships with her lawyer husband (Patrick Chesnais) and two teenage sons. She is a successful editor in a publishing house. Yet Diane begins an affair with Emilio (Boris Terral), a hydraulic engineer 20 years younger, and her overwhelming passion for Emilio starts to dominate her life—to the point she risks losing both her family and her career. She misses important meetings after she secretly brings Emilio along on a crucial business trip. Ironically, as her husband finds out about the affair, he is defending an old woman who killed her unfaithful husband with a dinner fork.

As in "Overseas," Rouan's previous acting/directing/co-writing effort, "Post Coitum: Animal Triste" develops a diverse group of characters. The script examines the effects Diane's affair has on people in her life, making the film more intriguing than are conventional films about romantic triangles that focus only on the lovers. Rouan's direction seamlessly combines a variety of moods that correspond to Diane's volatile emotional state, skillfully including an imaginative fantasy of the euphoric Diane as she begins her involvement with Emilio.

The film is dominated by the raw intensity of Rouan's performance. Rouan's unflinching camera reveals both Diane's intimate feelings as well as the hysteria that eventually develops as the affair ends. Rouan's efforts are also supported by a fine cast: Chesnais makes the husband a sympathetic figure who hopes his wife will return to the stability of her family, and Nils Tavernier is particularly good as a novelist who gets over his writer's block by fictionalizing Diane's story.—Ed Scheid

WESTERN ★★★1/2

Starring Sergi Lopez, Sacha Bourdo and Elisabeth Vitali. Directed by Manuel Poirier. Written by Manuel Poirier and Jean-Francois Goyet. Produced by Maurice Bernart. No stateside distributor set. Comedy. French-language; English subtitles. Running time: 136 min. Won a special jury prize.

Not a western, "Western" is a road movie set in western France. Owing to its clever script and slightly bittersweet tone, "Western" earned a special jury prize at Cannes. A story of two impossibly opposite men bonding, of love lost and friendship found, it takes a number of elements of American road movies and gives them a decidedly French twist.

A handsome, confident Spaniard named Paco (Sergi Lopez), and a shy, diminutive Russian, Nino (Sacha Bourdo), are each traveling through Brittany in search of love. With nothing in common, a chance encounter brings them together: Nino steals Paco's car. Looking for the unlikely thief, Paco finds love instead, in the form of Marinette (Elisabeth Vitali), a lovely antiques dealer. When she insists they take time apart to discover if their love is solid, a dejected Paco heads for the road again, again by chance encountering Nino—and his car. Despite their differences, they join forces and eventually become close, sharing bizarre meetings with, among others, an angry farmer, a pair of sexually liberated models, and a lusty single mother of eight.

FESTIVAL REVIEWS

The road movie is nothing new, as fans of Hope and Crosby know well. But what makes "Western" so uniquely French is its preoccupation with love, emotions and human psychology. Nonetheless, funny, touching, familiar yet original, "Western" seems like it could be a natural hit for stateside audiences.—Lael Loewenstein

THE SERPENT'S KISS ★★

Starring Ewan McGregor, Greta Scacchi, Pete Postlethwaite and Richard E. Grant. Directed by Philippe Rousselot. Written by Tim Rose Price. Produced by Robert Jones, John Battsek and Tim Rose Price. No stateside distributor set. Drama. Not yet rated. Running time: 110 min.

"The Serpent's Kiss" is the directorial debut of French cinematographer Philippe Rousselot, Oscar winner for "A River Runs Through It." In 1699, Meneer Chrome ("Trainspotting's" Ewan McGregor) is hired by Thomas Smithers ("The Lost World's" Pete Postlethwaite) to design an elaborate estate garden as a present for wife Juliana ("Emma's" Greta Scacchi). Bored by country solitude, she has little interest in husband or garden. Daughter Thea (Carmen Chaplin, Charlie's granddaughter) is so uncomfortable in the formal environment that her father believes she is disturbed.

Juliana's scheming cousin Lord Warburton ("Twelfth Night's" Richard E. Grant) is secretly using the garden to bankrupt Thomas, hoping that Juliana will turn her attentions to him. Nothing goes as planned; The garden is destroyed by storm, Juliana is attracted to the young Chrome, but Chrome is drawn to Thea.

The premise is similar to that of "The Draughtsman's Contract," but this film is more concerned with the feelings of its characters than was Greenaway's chilly tale. The theme of manipulation in "The Serpent's Kiss" is not original, but the film is made entertaining by the accomplished cast, particularly Scacchi, who is adept in whatever period her films are set, and she aptly conveys that her character is the one most constricted by the conventions of the time from revealing her emotions directly. Grant's flamboyance is always amusing. Also, the painterly images of the cast in 17th-century costumes in the unusual garden add to the film's visual appeal.—Ed Scheid

TORONTO

PORTRAITS CHINOIS ★★★★

Starring Helena Bonham Carter, Romane Bohringer and Jean-Claude Brialy. Directed by Martine Dugowson. Written by Martine Dugowson and Peter Chase. Produced by Georges Benayoun. No stateside distributor set. Drama. French-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 138 min.

A group of artistically inclined French friends fall in love and out of love in traditional romantic manner in "Portraits Chinois" ("Shadow Play"), but everything old here feels new again. Set in Paris (of course), "Portraits Chinois" is as intricately developed and lovingly crafted as the photos to which its title refers. It begins with a couple, English fashion designer Ada (Helena Bonham Carter) and screenwriter Paul (Jean Philippe Ecoffey) moving into a new home. They've been together for a while, but they're not really happy or communicating their dissatisfaction to each other. Guido (Sergio Castellito), Paul's writing partner, is having severe relationship problems but can only mope around Ada and Paul's kitchen. Enter Lise ("Mina Tannenbaum's" Romane Bohringer), an up-and-coming fashion designer who finds herself in the middle of Ada and Paul's marriage.

"Portraits Chinois" sounds like a glib Woody Allen film, but it cuts much deeper. Director/co-writer Martine Dugowson (also "Mina Tannenbaum") follows these four and their friends as they laugh, bicker and lie to each other—in short, as they live their lives of not-so-quiet desperation. She even allows the audience to hear her characters' thoughts, an effective device in that it allows the filmmaker to contradict the words that are coming from their mouths.

Her whole cast is excellent, but standouts are Bonham Carter (who, impressively, learned to speak fluent French for her role) as the somewhat cold Ada, and Castellito as the hilariously hapless Guido. Jean-Claude Brialy as Sandre, Ada's domineering fashion mentor, is also fine. With a sublime soundtrack (including the ubiquitous Leonard Cohen tune), "Portraits Chinois" contrasts romantic musical stereotypes with the less-than-flattering reality of people's ordinary love lives. But the movie allows for a smart and happy ending that nicely twists the fiction/reality conundrum of the cinema. Happiest of all should be those movie buffs who venture out to see this unheralded gem.—Shlomo Schwartzberg

SWANN ★

Starring Miranda Richardson, Brenda Fricker and Michael Ontkean. Directed by Anna Benson Gyles. Written by David Young. Produced by Ann Scott and Christina Jennings. No stateside distributor set. Mystery. Not yet rated. Running time: 96 min.

This tepid and innocuous story about a best-selling writer, Sarah Maloney ("Kansas City's" Miranda Richardson), who's trying to pen a biography of Mary Swann, a murdered farm wife and obscure Canadian poet, has all the ingredients needed to be a clever little mystery. Unfortunately, the only real mystery is why anyone wanted to make "Swann" in the first place.

The drama, based on a novel by Carol Shields, should spring to life when Sarah comes to Canada to research her book and meets the last woman to see Mary Swann alive—the local librarian, Rose ("A Time to Kill's" Brenda Fricker). Rose distrusts Sarah's celebrity status, wishing to do her own modest tribute to the rural scribe. Yet nothing comic, or remotely dramatic, is done to develop and explore their competing purposes. It even remains unclear why Swann maintains such a haunting presence in their lives. Instead, contrived circumstances involving a jealous boyfriend (David Cubitt) and a potential romance for Sarah with the dimply Stephen (Michael Ontkean) clutter the film just so Sarah and Rose can reconcile, and Sarah can finally find herself.

Richardson gives the kind of pinched performance to which she's proved prone in dramas like "Dance With a Stranger" and "Damage" (as opposed to the expansiveness she displayed in the lighter "Enchanted April" and "The Evening Star"). Fricker, who usually displays a noble integrity, comes across here as merely earnest. Also, lacking dramatic tension to cover such faults, "Swann" allows audiences to see lapses of logic in its story. For example, when Sarah's house is broken into and her book materials are stolen, she doesn't call the police or set out on the culprit's trail; she decides she'd rather have intercourse with Stephen. And how many writers would find the theft of their work the perfect aphrodisiac?—Kevin Courrier

GONE, GONE, FOREVER GONE ★★

Starring Phuong Dung, Le Tuan Anh and Hoang Phuc. Directed by Ho Quang Minh. Written by Nguy Ngu and Ho Quang Minh. Produced by Tran Thanh Hung. No stateside distributor set. Drama. Vietnamese-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 85 min.

Vietnamese history is given the full treatment in this epic tale spanning the country's last 50 years, including its disastrous split before Vietnam was reunified. Two brothers whose lives were torn asunder by the war—one went to the North, one to the South—come together afterward through the good offices of their sister, a Buddhist nun.

"Gone, Gone, Forever Gone" is a beautifully shot movie, with much emphasis on the changes of the seasons and Vietnam's natural beauty, but the film doesn't have much impact. Whether it's because of a low budget or director/co-scripter Ho Quang Minh's deficiencies as a filmmaker, the delineation of different time periods in the story is never very clear. Nor are the film's many flashbacks deftly inserted into the structure. What characterizations there are in "Gone, Gone, Forever Gone" are perfunctory at best. Reverence for history is fine, but this dry movie needs more flesh and blood.—Shlomo Schwartzberg

STRANGLED LIVES ★★

Starring Vincent Linden, Sabrina Ferilli and Luca Zingaretti. Directed by Ricky Tognazzi. Written by Simona Izzo, Graziana Diana and Gniseppe Manfridi. Produced by Vittorio Cecchi Gori and Rita Cecchi Gori. No stateside distributor set. Thriller. Italian-language; English subtitles. Not yet rated. Running time: 108 min.

"Strangled Lives" is a thriller that aims to equal the work of the great Francesco Rosi ("The Mattei Affair," "Illustrious Corpses"), but it's a slick, empty work. The film concerns Francesco (Vincent Linden), an architect running his late father-in-law's construction firm who's besieged by financial and personnel problems at work. Despite the doubts of his loving wife, Miriam (Sabrina Ferilli), he is cajoled by an old acquaintance, Sergio (Luca Zingaretti), into involving him in the family business, a decision that becomes potentially fatal when Sergio's evil nature is revealed.

Director Ricky Tognazzi and his scripting trio might have serious concerns about the corruption infecting virtually every aspect of Italian life, but "Strangled Lives'" melodramatic approach to its subject doesn't make for gripping drama. And a subplot involving Sergio's designs on Miriam borders on the exploitative. In the end, the film seems well made but strangles itself, leaving no lasting traces. It's the perfect murder.—Shlomo Schwartzberg

THRILL RIDE—THE SCIENCE OF FUN ★★

Narrated by Harry Shearer. Directed by Ben Stassen. Produced by Charlotte Huggins. A Sony Classics release. Documentary. Rated G. Running time: 38 min.
Format: IMAX.

Opening with a bang, "Thrill Ride—The Science of Fun" takes viewers on an animated, hair-raising ride through a dark, falling-down mineshaft using computer-generated imagery to bring to life the hard turns and tummy-pitching sensations of a real roller coaster. Despite this colorful and highly imaginative intro, the rest of this New Wave International production fails to provide the same momentum.

The film opens by documenting the history of roller coasters from their origin in Paris in 1804 to the peak of the rides' fame at the turn of the century to today's daredevil amusement park diversions. By mounting cameras on both the front and back of a coaster, director Ben Stassen allows viewers to vicariously experience the same sensations as those aboard, queasy stomachs and all. But the real focuses of Stassen, a CGI expert, are the history of ride simulators, starting with their development by NASA and the military, and the ways computer-generated imagery is used to create special effects in film. To demonstrate, "Thrill Ride" uses footage from popular ride films "Secrets of the Lost Temple," "The Devil's Mine Ride" and "Asteroid Adventure."

Although the overall affect of these simulated rides is pretty close to the experience of the "real thing," the thrill of a CGI ride still can't compare to plunging down a roller coaster's steep wooden track, wind in your face, and hearing the clacking of the rails and the sighs of straining wood beneath you. Given the film's concerted attentions to the technical aspects of today's "virtual reality" rides and ride films, "Thrill Ride" doesn't quite earn the E-ticket status it promises.—Pat Kramer

ALASKA: SPIRIT OF THE WILD ★★★1/2

Narrated by Charlton Heston. Directed by George Casey. Written by George Casey and Mose Richards. Produced by George Casey and Paul Novros. Narrated by Charlton Heston. A Graphic Films Corp. release. Documentary. Unrated. Running time: 40 min.
Format: IMAX.

"Alaska: Spirit of the Wild" is the latest IMAX film by the celebrated team of George Casey, a three-time Oscar-nominated director ("Africa: The Serengeti," "Ring of Fire") and Paul Novros, who shares production credits with Casey on the former and several other critically acclaimed IMAX-format films ("The Great Barrier Reef," "Planet Ocean").

Like their many other colorful, in-depth films, "Alaska" provides a wealth of intriguing footage celebrating and unveiling the mystique surrounding the rugged territory. At the same time, it pays homage to Alaska's native inhabitants and the scores of settlers who lost their lives trying to tame this wild land where extreme weather conditions, glaciers and impassable mountain ranges dominate the landscape.

"Alaska" is a beautiful movie. In one scene, a herd of stampeding caribou fly over the camera in a shot for which director of photography Rodney Taylor literally risked his life. Other scenes depict close-up footage of great walls of ice, a hundred or more feet in height, splintering away from a massive motherlode and violently exploding into the ocean. In yet others, the camera travels over woodlands and rivers, perilously close to the sides of approaching mountains. Best of all, though, are the closeups of Alaska's most numerous residents—its wildlife—with captivating shots of polar bear, black bear, sea lions, wolves, moose, caribou and (just offshore) humpback whales. The film provides the excitement "Thrill Ride—The Science of Fun" should have.—Pat Kramer

FLASHBACK: AUGUST 17, 1946
What BOXOFFICE said about...

THE BIG SLEEP

[The latest noir entry, "L.A. Confidential," comes from the studio that released this mystery on August 31, 1946. Here's what BOXOFFICE had to say.]

Fast-moving murder mystery without time for a yawn, except the title. It's Bogart from action start to gun-blazing finish, with excellent support from Lauren Bacall and all others of the cast. Plenty of high-wire suspense and unexpected situations that call for nail-nibbling or chair-arm twisting. Bogart is a two-fisted, many-gunned private detective who meets the strange Sternwood family, and odd events pop off like firecrackers as he tries to solve the difficulties of two charming but erratic daughters. Toss in half a dozen assorted murders, flavor well with realistic fistics, stir with revolvers, automatics and tommyguns, and you've got a first-rate thriller. Excellently produced and directed by Howard Hawks, with equal plaudits to Sid Hickox for photography. Highly recommended for fans who like their whodunits highly seasoned, and for those troubled with somnolence. Starring Humphrey Bogart, Lauren Bacall, John Ridgely, Martha Vickers, Dorothy Malone, Peggy Knudsen and Regis Toomey.

SELLING ANGLES:

Outstanding bet is more plugging of the established names of Bogart and Bacall on marquees, on fronts and in lobbies. Here's another bookstore tie-in with a sales drive for Raymond Chandler's novels and similar murder mysteries. As blackmail features in the plot, use mailing lists in various ways. Get cooperation of photo stores, as a camera plays a big part in the story. Furniture stores could cooperate with bed displays in windows.

BEAN ★★★1/2

Starring Rowan Atkinson, Peter MacNicol, Harris Yulin, Pamela Reed and Burt Reynolds. Directed by Mel Smith. Written by Richard Curtis, Robin Driscoll and Rowan Atkinson. Produced by Tim Bevan, Eric Fellner and Peter Bennett-Jones. A Gramercy release. Comedy. Not yet rated. Running time: 80 min. Opens 10/17.

Mr. Bean, deftly played and created by British thesp Rowan Atkinson, and his antics are at home on PBS in the States, but globally they know no bounds. For most people around the world, just mention the name "Bean" and you hear instant laughter. His 30-minute sketches—in which he usually wreaks havoc on just about anyone, leaving a trail of chaos behind him—are prime-time fare. "Bean" marks his full-feature debut. It was indeed a task to transform his TV character into a full-fledged, three-dimensional personage, but the finished product is well worth seeing—it's an incredibly entertaining piece of comic mayhem.

The story: Bean, never without his true-friend teddy, is the most inept and detested employee at the British Royal National Gallery; the staff can't wait to dump him. When a rich benefactor (Burt Reynolds) donates $50,000,000 to the Grierson Gallery of California to bring America's greatest painting, "Whistler's Mother," back home, the Brits see their chance. The folks at the Royal National are asked to send their finest academician to oversee travel proceedings. They decide to send not their greatest scholar but the abhorred Bean in their desperate hope of getting rid of him forever. Within days of arriving in Los Angeles, Bean has almost totally destroyed the marriage, career and life of his host. Then the gallery's chairman (Harris Yulin) leaves Bean alone in the room with the painting—another disastrous scenario.

"Bean" is truly a gag-a-minute film, even if a few of those border on the sophomoric. Thanks to Atkinson's ability to weave true emotion into his character, the audience senses that underneath that sadistic and egomaniacal shell Mr. Bean does have real feelings. Watch his eyes: When he's told that he's nothing but a klutz and everything is his fault, one can feel only compassion.

The film earlier opened in Holland and Australia to fantastic results, and much of the world followed this summer; it finally reaches American screens on October 17. None too soon: "Bean" is a clever mixture of slapstick, British humor and L.A. sunshine. In the end, after almost ruining everybody's life—and then ultimately saving the day—and with teddy safe at home, Bean cruises down Sunset Boulevard (the Randy Newman ditty "I Love L.A." blaring in the background), savoring every moment. What more could you wish for the man? Well, how about a sequel?—PKay Krieg

Starring Russell Crowe and Salma Hayek. Directed by Robert Greenwald. Written by Michael Cristofer. Produced by Robert Greenwald and George Moffly. A Warner Bros. release. Romantic comedy. Rated R for language and sexuality. Running time: 89 min. Screened at the Seattle fest. Opens 9/26 NY/LA/Tor.

Steve and Monica fall into a love so fulfilling that he stops smoking and she no longer watches her weight. But wait a minute: If this relationship is so great, why is Steve ("L.A. Confidential's" Russell Crowe) gasping for air and Monica ("Fools Rush In's" Salma Hayek) feeling so burdened? Therein lies the contradiction that comprises "Breaking Up," the story of an affair that—depending on the hour—is so perfect it's doomed or so terrible it works. As Monica says, "It's a failure, but it's ours."

Written by Michael Cristofer ("The Witches of Eastwick"),"Breaking Up" is constructed like a patchwork quilt, with a variety of vignettes sewn together into a multi-textured conglomerate of ideas and emotions. Some scenes are pithy monologues in which a character discusses Freud directly with the audience. In others, notably a funny segment at Monica's gym, the movie evokes sketch comedy found on late-night TV. Director Robert Greenwald is adept with each of his film's ambiences and able to bundle diverse scenes into a continuous story. Overall, he employs tight shots and cramped sets to create a sense of claustrophobia that reflects Steve and Monica's relationship as it progresses through several years of breakups and makeups.

In addition, Steve, a photographer, and Monica, a teacher, are "Breaking Up's" only characters, which means Crowe and Hayek must double-handedly carry the entire film. For the most part, they're up to the

ask. From the moment Steve meets Monca, the pair's attraction seems genuine, and both characters conduct themselves like eal people, even when their dialogue suggests acting more than living. This New Regency acquisition is a good movie, but it doesn't have enough zingy lines or story nnovations to rise above the level of prootypical romantic comedy. Steve and Monca can't live with or without each other, but noviegoers in search of chuckles and romantic insight can take or leave this inematic coupling.—Ian Hodder

THE DISAPPEARANCE OF GARCIA LORCA ★★1/2

Starring Andy Garcia, Esai Morales, eroen Krabbe, Marcela Walerstein, Giancarlo Giannini and Edward James Olmos. Directed by Marcos Zurinaga. Written by Marcos Zurinaga & Juan Antonio Ramos and Neil Cohen. Produced by Marcos Zurinaga, Moctesuma Esparza nd Robert Katz. A Sony Pictures release. Drama. Rated R for bloody violence and a cene of sexuality. Running time: 108 min. Opens 9/12 NY/LA.

Films in which political intrigue is played or political commentary and not for narrative xcitement are among the most difficult to nake successful. The last great political film nay have been 1969's "Z"; though it's in that radition, "The Disappearance of Garcia orca" (aka "Lorca," "Death in Granada" and Blood of a Poet") is only modestly effective.

ased on two Ian Gibson books about the olitical killing of the Spanish poet Garcia orca, the film boasts a number of interestg characterizations and some compelling cting. But it has two themes—the inhuanity of fascism, and relationship of faer to son—and, paired together, the two ake an incongruent mix.

Filmmaker Marcos Zurinaga ("Tango") early is passionate about his subject, but rhaps too much. At key moments, his hite-hatted characters declaim more than eak; their fervency forestalls audience npathy against the blackguards, and an fputting score is simple-minded in its suport. On the positive side, most of the play- s give interesting rhythms to their aracters that overcome the freneticism of e film's tendency toward back-and-forng in time.—Kim Williamson

Starring Greg Kinnear, Lauren Holly, Joan Cusack, Jay Thomas and Jill Hennessy. Directed by Keith Samples. Written by Keith Samples and Kevin Meyer. Produced by David Kirkpatrick and Tony Amatullo. A Paramount release. Romantic comedy. Rated R for sex-related material (rating being appealed to CARA board). Running time: 93 min. Screened at the American Film Market.

Former Rysher head and veteran producer Keith Samples ("2 Days in the Valley," "The Evening Star") makes a forgettable writing/directing debut with "A Smile Like Yours," a mostly formulaic romantic comedy that's neither romantic enough nor comedic enough to sustain much interest in an already tired premise. Greg Kinnear and Lauren Holly star as Danny and Jennifer Robertson, a blissfully happy couple with everything any blissfully happy couple could want—except children. After much unsuccessful effort, they finally seek professional help and discover that Danny suffers from "lazy swimmers." An obstacle course of humiliating fertility therapies ensues, introducing elements of stress and strife into the once blissfully happy relationship that eventually threaten to tear it asunder. In the end, of course, the difficulties are ironed out and the Robertsons become blissfully happy once more.

Engaging supporting turns by Jay Thomas and Joan Cusack as the obligatory buddies/confidants and Jill Hennessy as the "almost other woman" make up somewhat for the lackluster leads, but the film still suffers under the hefty weight of its own self-importance. The movie seems all too blithely positive that there's something on the subject of having babies that a decade's worth of baby-boomer "baby" movies hasn't already drilled into the ground.

What ultimately discredits the entire premise of the film, however, has more to do with the sheer contrivance of its plot, which assumes that two such blissfully happy people would still choose to keep secrets from each other, even when their

Starring Sylvester Stallone, Ra Liotta, Harvey Keitel, Michael Rapa port, Annabella Sciorra and Robert D Niro. Directed and written by Jame Mangold. Produced by Cary Woods an Cathy Kourad. A Miramax release Drama. Rated R for violence, strong lan guage and brief nudity.

Combining big-city cop intrigue wit small-town routine, this latest from filmma ker James Mangold ("Heavy") satisfies th palates of those craving a drama withou special effects, aliens or explosions but wit story and characters. Although the cast con tent here suggests major tough-guy actio is on hand, the reality is that the players roles are pretty much equal; no one receive superstar treatment, which might be a dis appointment for other audiences (specific ally, the male action demo).

The setting is a small New Jersey bur that has become a new hometown for number of NYPD officers. Garrison's she riff (Sylvester Stallone) is half-deaf, slow moving (because of his waistline girth) an very passive. Stallone, who gained 4 pounds for the role, isn't his usual tone action hunk, but nonetheless as the Sherif of Copland he once again is the law.

The story focuses on a cop ("Metro's" Mi chael Rapaport), an alleged shooting, a ca crash and the deaths of two people. Then i quick order come a suicide, lies, coverup jealousies and missed opportunities in thi story about exposing a burg full of corru people sharing a large secret. In the end, th quiet sheriff must decide between his friend or doing what is right.—Dwayne E. Leslie

Navy's elite Seals. Scenes of her training—climb the ropes, crawl the ground—are just what audiences might expect, if higher than usual on the machismo level; so is the reaction of her male mates, as evidenced by her tough boot-camp commandant (Viggo Mortensen). Yet it's not till the narrative takes an odd byway—the unstoppable O'Neil suddenly folds when phony charges of fraternization with non-elisted women (i.e., lesbian activity) arise, and the senator's supposedly true nature is revealed—that "G.I. Jane" becomes just plain bad; both the senator's and O'Neil's decisions come out of nowhere.

Fortunately, the narrative resuscitates when O'Neil goes on her first mission in a finale that would have been even more rousing had it been more believable (the body counts on the two warring sides is hardly balanced, with the "bad" guys—Arabs, of course—apparently unable to shoot straight even at close range). Still, what gives this Caravan/Scott Free/Moving Pictures production its power for contemporary audiences is its straight-from-the-headlines attentions to the question of women in the military, and on this Scott & co. are right on target.—Kim Williamson
